Poor Bryan

Most humiliating to Mr. William J. Bryan were the rebuff and rebuke administered to him by his party in his own beloved State of Nebraska. He has suffered a great blow to his prestige. Perhaps coming events were casting their shadows before on the momentous occasion of his repudiation in the Nebraska convention. If so the Democracy is entitled to felicitation. And yet, when we come to think it over, how unreasonable for the party to rid itself at this time of the incubus that it has so long nourished! It would be a strange political paradox were the great prophet of innovation to be cast off just as his fantastic creeds and crotchets were beginning to crystallize. If the love of principle is greater in this country than the love of men then Mr. Bryan as the uncompromising, untiring and undeviating proponent of all the principles that are the prevailing distractions of the moment is entitled to the confidence not of his own party alone but of all parties. What has Mr. Bryan been fighting for all through the years if not for paternalism and populism in all the various guises and devices by which it may seem feasible to give them expression? Who has been whining and crying in season and out of season for railroad regulation, for sequestration of our resources beyond the reach of industry, for the direct primary, for the recall, the referendum and all the other short-cuts to the millennium? Assuredly it cannot be questioned that Mr. Bryan is the one and only individual in all this broad land entitled to our esteem for having compelled our reluctant appreciation of these divine expedients. If we are to believe that the light is now penetrating the intelligence of the American people; if we are to believe that the people are now bestowing their affections in accordance with their ultimate and supposedly infallible judgment, then to Mr. Bryan is due the applause of his long benighted countrymen. If Mr. Bryan is to be consigned to the ash-heap of worn-out and abandoned celebrities then history will cite his fate as one of the many instances of the monstrous ingratitude of democracy. It may be urged in extenuation that as in the case of Aristides the people grew tired of the incessant obtrusion of the Peerless One; but the answer to this plea is that it was because the people were so long obtuse, because they were so long insensible of their interests, that Mr. Bryan in taxing their patience for their own benefit dropped from the extreme of popularity to the extreme of obnoxiousness. And the fact remains that during the years when he was supposed to be squaring all principles with his maxims and making the whole Democratic Party tributary to his convenience, he was really engaged in bringing the true gospel to the hearts of the people.

The Obligations of a Grand Juror

Some sage reflections on the ethical principles that should govern the behaviour of grand jurors we find in the editorial columns of the New York Sun. The Grand Jury of Queens County, New York, recently indicted the president of the borough for some form of official misconduct. Coincidentally with this action several jurors joined in a petition to the Governor to remove the Borough President at once. For doing this they are censured by the Sun, which, of course, cannot be suspected of the sinister purpose of impugning the conduct of certain estimable and impeccable gentlemen who thought they were making glorious history for themselves when they were indicting men at random with never a more urgent instigation than the Jovian nod of the Hon. Francis J. Heney. "By voting to indict the Borough President," says the Sun, "they have declared under oath, that there is a prima facie case against him. Nevertheless the presumption of the old common law still remains in full force and effect, that a person thus accused is to be deemed innocent until a trial jury has pronounced him guilty. Pending the verdict neither the Grand Jury, the Judge, nor any other official connected with the administration of justice should do anything to overcome that presumption, except the public prosecutor whose duty it is to establish the charge if the evidence warrants it. What we mean is that the function of a grand juror is so largely judicial that it is unbecoming for him to figure in any outside controversy directly or indirectly involving the guilt of a man whom he has indicted." All of which, we submit, is of some local interest even in the somewhat dim light of a history the last chapter of which has not yet been written. It is of interest not merely because of the familiar principles thus laid down by an unbiased authority, but for the further reason that it is in the nature of proof of the fact that a poison-dripping press bureau misled one of the leading newspapers of the country. For of course it is inconceivable that a newspaper conscious of the sanctity of the foregoing principles would ever have acclaimed the wanton and repeated violation of all of them by every functionary that was sworn to hold them inviolable.

A White Light on Reformers

Once more we are reminded that "if to do were as easy as to teach others what were good to be done chapels had been churches and poor men's cottages princes' palaces." For some eminent reformers have been found out. It's the old story that's always new in this festive world of masquerade, the story that illustrates the ancient theological maxim—"The greater the sinner the greater the saint." And as usual we are all profoundly shocked at the disclosure of man's duplicity, as though any of us were without some disguise, some artifice to set ourselves off as being better than we are. If we would vindicate our abhorrence of cant let us not be too scornful of the Kents and Pinchots, whose pretensions, after all, may not be in the nature of barefaced imposture. It is possible that they really wish to do good, but have deluded themselves with their own casuistries and have proved too weak to live up to their own ideals. Let us teach them generosity by withholding reproaches and considering that they enlarge our conceptions of human nature, and instruct us by their absurdities and their composites. They are of the type of men who are congenitally inclined to mend the world. It is the misfortune of such men that they are absolutely devoid of scruple against wounding the feelings of their neighbor. Persuaded that an affectation of righteous indignation is most suitable to their benign purposes, they go about scattering venom, impugning motives and traducing everybody opposed to them with all the vehemence and asperity of bigoted orthodoxy. Naturally such men are frequently detected in the practice of petty meannesses; for they are wholly lacking in magnanimity, the one quality absolutely essential to instinctive repugnance to the small and ugly vices of selfish human nature. Nevertheless these men may have a certain amount of sincerity and some very good principles. It is possible that they are accessible to the pangs of remorse and the raptures of repentance. So far as Mr. Kent is concerned it is far from certain that he is as bad as some dailies would have us believe. But Mr. Pinchot, the bosom friend of posterity, appears to be hopelessly defective in his morals. He came among us on a bee line from the sanctum of Editor Roosevelt to preach conservation and purity for the benefit of the Hon. Hiram Johnson. We were told that his participation in California politics was at the instance of the Colonel. His most intimate friends publicly assured us that such was the case, and Mr. Pinchot said nothing to disabuse our minds of the belief that Mr. Roosevelt had espoused the cause of our vociferous reformers. If he did not assume false colors, at all events he wore them. And in all probability this rampaging censor of men's morals is wholly unconscious of the meanness of the role that he has been playing. Since Mr. Pinchot's appearance in California, furthermore, we have learned that he is pulling his wires with a view to getting the nomination for Governor of New York. Which justifies us in considering how disinterested is his zeal as a conservationist. There is nothing in New York that Mr. Pinchot can conserve except his own political interests. His hobby is to be ridden only in a saddle made by Uncle Sam. Now as to Mr. Kent, while it may be true that he has been "caught with the goods on him" nobody can affirm beyond peradventure that he is a criminal at heart. But it is not in the role of land-grabber that this reformer presents a forbidding aspect. In this plight he is more provocative of merriment than anything else. His simulation of indignation when caught, his intimation that political motives inspired the lifting of the lid, the disingenuousness that characterized his whole behaviour—these are the things that throw a white light on his character. And all these things are especially conducive to reflection because but a short time ago Mr. Kent was most conspicuously callous to the Scriptural injunction, "Judge not lest ye be judged." Furthermore, as it now appears that this blustering reformer has no taste for his own narrow-minded standards and that his motives are not above suspicion it may not be considered impertinent to ask when he formed the resolution to proffer his services to his country. This question is of some importance since the answer to it may enable us to judge to what extent Mr. Kent's recent activities have been influenced by a passion for political distinction. We have been told that when he gave a public park to the government he was less public spirited than selfish, since the gift enhanced the value of certain water rights. Whatever be the truth in this connection it is obvious that the gift served to introduce Mr. Kent to public notice. And it was not long after the making of this gift that Mr. Kent identified himself with the cause of reform in San Francisco, and went about judging and branding with the cocksureness of a commissioner from Heaven. How much better we should be able to judge of Mr. Kent if we knew whether he was looking forward to this campaign when he was making a record for himself both as a philanthropist and a scourge of men!

Criticism and the Drama

Augustus Thomas, the playwright, having expressed the opinion that as a consequence of the refining of public taste the quality of the American drama has greatly improved, a critic takes occasion to remark that both playwright and public should thank the critics who have been telling them what's what. To criticism more than anything else he attributes the improvement that has been made in the drama. In this critic's judgment we are not disposed to concur. We do not believe that the critics are entitled to so much credit as he would give them. While there has been marked improvement in the tone and quality of criticism in this country in recent years it is still far from fulfilling its proper function. The bulk of it is ungoverned by any of the canons of literary art. If there are any standards of criticism generally accepted we are not aware of them. Nor are we aware that in this country there is yet any great passion for criticism, for the reading of it on its own merits. Critics to be influential must be read. Charles Fox used to say that he derived as much pleasure from reading Longinus on Homer as in reading the poet himself. Have we many critics of the drama whose writings afford such keen pleasure that they are read with avidity and for pleasure and instruction? Essays in criticism are a form of the literary art, and in this branch of literature some of the greatest geniuses have done their most entertaining and instructive work. Some of the finest specimens of English are in the form of criticism, as all know who are familiar with the works of Lamb, Hazlitt, Johnson, Carlyle, Ruskin, Leigh Hunt, Macaulay and Arnold. In English literature there are not a few critics whose criticisms are as well worth reading as the subjects thereof. This kind of criticism has not yet been cultivated in this country. We have some helpful criticism, but not much if it is to be found in the performances of the men who write about the drama in the daily papers. The critic steeped in estheticism, of deep sensibility, catholic in taste, who can follow a poet, a playwright or a painter to the height of his compass, sympathize with his most brilliant powers and his most exquisite passions—this is the kind of critic who can refine the public and minister to artistic genius. But he is exceedingly rare. Criticism that confines itself to facts, niceties of grammar and quantities of prosody, there is an abundance of. It is smart but useless. It has no sensibility to excellence. The critic who is quick to perceive trivial imperfections is usually incapable of appreciating beauties. Such was the critic who found fault with a Ceres of Raphael because a wheat-sheaf was not tied as a reaper would have tied it. Quite as useless as hypercriticism is that which is devoted entirely to praise. Scrupulous analysis is the only sane and instructive criticism, and of that we have very little. It is not to be denied however that there has been some improvement in criticism. One of the gratifying signs of the times is that the merely flippant no longer predominates, and that we have many critics who are not always either altogether laudatory or condemnatory, amiable or cruel, rhapsodic or contemptuous. This is the easiest kind of criticism to write. It does not demand of the critic the labor of familiarizing himself with the technique of any art. To flatter or find fault one need not be endowed with the instinct of what is right or wrong in artistry; one has but to have a command of the terms of encomium and censure. Competent criticism requires expert knowledge and taste of a high order, and when conscientiously directed it is of supreme importance. In this country today there are a few critics who discuss the drama intelligently. They have doubtless brought some people to a realization of what is in conformity with the canons of sincere art; they have perhaps taught some people to differentiate the true from the fictitious, the banal from the beautiful, the wholesome from the meretricious. These writers have done some good. But for the most beneficial influence on public taste we are indebted to England which has profited from the great interest that has been taken there in the current literature of France and other countries. It was by way of England and with the help of Englishmen that we formed the acquaintance of Ibsen. English writers have improved themselves in foreign schools, and they have given us not only the result of their own creative faculties but some excellent translations. They have stimulated directly, and in a measure through some of our own literary men, a taste for the drama as literature, as an art to be appreciated aside from the interest that it has in scenic presentation. The consequence is that people who formerly confined their reading to novels are now reading dramas, and that men and women with the literary bent are trying their hand at dramas instead of novels. Formerly it was believed that to become a successful playwright one had to have experience of stage mechanism, and our plays were written chiefly by illiterate stage managers and actors skilled in the use of properties and the commonplace devices for titillating the emotions. They gave us sublimated claptrap and all the approved ingenuities of theatricalism. With great facility in handling the ancient tools of their trade, with elaborate stage-craft and theatric cunning they produced the most thrilling concoctions of fustian and fol-de-rol. Now they nauseate us. Gradually we have been educated out of our tolerance of the mechanical drama with its hackneyed situations and its artificial sentimentalities. Playwrights with taste and talent for the literary art are demonstrating the possibility of making sincerity more captivating than buncombe. They are proving that one doesn't have to be a stage carpenter before becoming a play builder; that technique is rather a matter of sensibility than a talent for mechanics. At the same time theatre-goers are learning that drama possessing literary merit is not exclusively for the enjoyment of high-brows. They are beginning to understand that good drama is above all things logical and reasonable, and that the playwright who expects them to suspend the operations of their mental faculties that they may yield their emotions to balderdash and bathos is a charlatan. All of which we believe is not to be attributed entirely to an improvement in criticism.

Perspective Impressions

James Rudolph Garfield, his admirers in San Francisco tell us, withdrew from the gubernatorial contest in Ohio on principle. The principle being that when a man knows he can't get what he wants it's no use asking for it.

Though John D. Rockefeller, most ardent of Prohibitionists, is taking whisky baths for his health he still objects to other men doing the same thing in their own way. How humiliating it would be to John if accidentally he should absorb a jag.

When Sarah Bernhardt became a great grandmother the other day she said, "I have experienced the crowning glory of my career." And all without the aid of a certificate of marriage.

Evidently current history is not philosophy teaching Jack London by example. For says Jack to the judge, "I'll get you yet." Thus we learn that history has not taught Jack that barking heneys are always in danger of having their teeth pulled.

The Ananias Club has received a new member—Colonel Harvey. Membership in this club long since ceased to be a mark of distinction; for all the world knows that there is only one man in the world ineligible to membership.

Professor Peck of Columbia says that it hasn't occurred to Dr. Jordan of Stanford that when a man is charged with an offense the charge must be proved before he is punished. Gradually the East is learning something of the curious philosophy of the West.

Correspondence

A Lawyer Who Suspects a Judge

To the Editor of Town Talk—Sir: Some weeks ago I read what Town Talk had to say about the distortion of the truth by the correspondent of the Stockton Mail in the case of a man who had been tried before Judge Lawlor and who was granted a new trial by the Court of Appeal. I was rendered curious by the statement that the Spectator believed the correspondent had been misled and also that he could name the man who had done the misleading. Can it be possible, I asked myself, that he thinks the correspondent was misled by Judge Lawlor. This I asked myself because it occurred to me that the only person who might have expected to receive some benefit from the flagrant misrepresentation of the circumstances of the case was the trial judge. When the correspondent subsequently admitted that Town Talk was right and he was wrong I gave no further thought to the matter until later on when glancing over my Mail I found this same correspondent boosting Judge Lawlor for the Supreme Court, representing him to be one of the grandest jurists in the State and traducing some of the present occupants of the bench. Now I am wondering whether I have discovered the identity of the Mail's correspondent. It strikes me that he is a man of Judge Lawlor's temperament.

It Would

To the Editor of Town Talk—Sir: I always take an interest in your comments on the shortcomings of the dailies. I wonder whether you took notice of a characteristic piece of deception in the Examiner of last week. I allude of course to the practice of asserting in a headline something that is not at all borne out in what follows. The Examiner published this headline: "Roosevelt for Pinchot as N. Y. Governor." In the body of the article were these words: "While the Colonel declined to make any comment for publication upon the subject of Pinchot for Governor of New York, he is reported to have thanked Dr. Lindsay very much for speaking so highly of Mr. Pinchot"; also, "Scarcely had Dr. Lindsay left the sanctum of the contributing editor until Mr. Roosevelt felt called upon to repudiate Pinchot's interference in the big factional warfare in California, etc." Now wouldn't that jar you?

Their Criminal Negligence

Editor Town Talk—Sir: It strikes me as remarkable, if what you say about the criminal negligence of the Park authorities is true, that the matter has not been discussed more generally in the press. If the Park authorities permitted children to drink diluted sewage for many days, they should be punished. I have never heard of any greater outrage. Who knows but that many deaths were caused by their negligence! Can it be possible that the newspapers have agreed among themselves to give this matter as little publicity as possible, and devote all their waste space to politics and gambling in Chinatown?

All the Great Are Not Gone

Editor Town Talk—Dear Sir: It is with great pleasure that I note in the current Town Talk, an article wherein the success of Frank Bacon now appearing in the "Fortune Hunter" is mentioned. In a profession where the longer one remains in a given spot, the less value one possesses, it is a gladsome cry to have heralded back to us who have elected to remain and fight it out, the success of a talented comrade. Time was, when many a real offer from a successful manager could not tempt us from the land of sunshine and goodfellowship, for here we knew the people were loyal and stood by us playerfolk who were fortunate enough to be endowed with that God-given grace called talent, but times have changed and some of us have not changed with the evolution. We fancy that the same loyalty to the player who has given his youth and his best to please his auditor still exists, and the shock is therefore the greater when we awaken to the realization of the truth. That truth is, that our old friends have gone, Where? We do not know, but they are gone, and thus some of us will drift into that land of uselessness which is the haven of many an artist who dreams of the past and wonders at the thoughtlessness of the many. Frank Bacon must have realized all this and more for he one day was missed from the haunts of his fellow player. That he has hit the mark, I am sure every one who ever knew him will rejoice. Yet this success is not surprising, for the city of San Francisco has long been termed the "Show me" town of the United States, and when one can please them here, he need not tremble when entering new fields. The pity of it all is, that there are some few artists here still, who do not realize that San Francisco has grown too small for their talents, and still remain, among whom I might mention, Edwin T. Emery, an artist to his finger tips, Miss Georgia Cooper, the best in her line seen here in ten years, Mr. George Osbourne, the dean of gentlemen players, Robert Lawler who has a future if he will it, James Corrigan, Marion Stuart, Helen Bechtel and some dozen more whose names do not at this moment come to me.

Sincerely yours,

—J. W. Author,

Pisa's Tower May Fall

Popular legend has it that the leaning Tower of Pisa was built out of the perpendicular of set purpose, but recent investigations show that this is untrue. It is feared that the tower will soon fall, like the Campanile of St. Mark's in Venice. An Italian Royal Commission has found that the tower cannot remain upright much longer and has recommended immediate measures for its safety. It has also been found that the foundations of the tower are only nine feet nine inches below the surface, that its base is immersed in a watery subsoil and that it originally stood bolt upright. In 1829 the tower was 144 feet out of the vertical line; it is now leaning just one foot more. The tower was begun in 1170 and its condition is explained by numerous earthquake shocks.

No Taxes in Minnesota

Minnesota's taxes may be abrogated for the year 1911. This is a situation that has probably never before occurred in any State. The Minnesota State treasury is groaning under a surplus which has never been duplicated. On the first of October there will be nearly $4,000,000 in the treasury. This surplus has arisen through the successful settlement of lumber cases, the gross earnings tax cases, the inheritance tax cases and others. Not only have large sums come into the treasury on account of these settlements but there will be a constantly augmented stream so that Minnesota bids fair to become a State unique in the history of taxation, in finding it unnecessary to tax its people a cent for its maintenance. What the State officers will do with the growing surplus is a matter at present guarded jealously.

Would Cut Off Queues

The Chinese Government has published particulars concerning the petition sent to the Emperor by the Chinese of the Pacific Coast asking permission to cut off their queues. The petition was entrusted to Prince Tao for presentation to the throne during his recent visit in this city. The queue was forced upon the Chinese as a badge of submission about 260 years ago by their Manchu conquerors who affected this style of headdress. Later the Chinese grew proud of the appendage and elaborated it with bright ribbons. But since becoming conversant with the customs of occidental civilization the Chinese have decided that the queue is a hindrance to their progress and ask that it be abolished as a visible sign of the awakening of their country.

The Pluviose Mystery

There is a rumor that when the French submarine Pluviose was sunk recently one woman was on board and went to her death with the ill-fated crew. Although it has not yet been substantiated this remarkable rumor has been deemed worthy of investigation and discussion by some of the most conservative French papers. One paper says that ten corpses were recovered and that only nine were officially reported. It is also stated that the captain of the submarine went aboard with "another person" whose name is unknown but who is supposed to have been a woman. Considerable excitement was caused in Calais by the statement that a dredger which got hold of the Pluviose was not allowed to continue its work. It is also alleged that one of the men who lived several hours after the catastrophe took notes which were found but have since disappeared. It is quite likely that there will be an official investigation of this mystery.

The Madrid of America

Being Somewhat Explanatory of the Splendid Ambition of the Border Town of Tia Juana in Baja California as Set Forth in the Statement of Don Patricio Hernandez Macarto, Alcalde of the Sun-Baked Pueblo

By Democritus

There are doings in Tia Juana. The famous old pueblo is waking up. Not content, however, with the fame it has already acquired by reason of its peculiar name and its accessibility to Los Angeles and San Diego tourist traffic, the ancient Mexican village has resolved to command the attention of the world by combining its native characteristics with the very latest up-to-date metropolitan innovations. Tia Juana has determined to put itself firmly on the map. Its citizens are no longer content to bask in the everlasting sunshine of upper Baja California while waiting for the wandering tenderfoot from over the Alta Californian border to come across and pay four pesos for a serape that will cost two American dollars additional to pass the American customs shack at the international boundary. The leading hombres and prominent hidalgos of Tia Juana have organized a junta grande for the purpose of boosting the town into a city and the city into a metropolis. After exhaustive discussion and the consumption of many gallons of such inspiration as hombres and hidalgos find in mescal when it moveth itself aright and in pulque when it is nine hours old, the junta whereased that Tia Juana had outgrown its dependence on the California tourist and the tally-ho bunch of Podunkians and Kalamazoonians who traverse the route from San Diego to the capital of Upper-Baja California merely to say on their return, "Oh, yes, we crossed over into Old Mexico while we were out there," and was now in fit condition to be rehabilitated from its half century of innocuous desuetude. It was also whereased that in contemplation of the speedy completion of the San Diego & Arizona railway it behooved the Tijuaneños to be up and doing everything and everybody. Therefore it was resolved as the sense of the junta that an official red light district be established around the bull ring and that not only should the lid be lifted from the town but that the town itself should be thrown wide open.

Amid loud and enthusiastic "vivas" and "bravos" that were distinctly heard in Chula Vista and other distant settlements, the assemblage dispersed in wildest confusion but unanimously agreed that the destiny of Tia Juana had been definitely settled. The Committee on Promotion and Publicity subsequently held an executive session in the municipal carcel vulgarly known as the town calaboose.

On a recent visit to Tia Juana I was given audience of the Alcalde, Don Patricio Hernandez Macarto, and in answer to my inquiries concerning the new movement for the betterment of conditions in the pueblo and the surrounding country, he said:

"Senor, it is our intention to make Tia Juana the Madrid of America. Some of us wanted to make it the Seville of America and others insisted that it should be the Barcelona of America; but better counsels prevailed and it has been finally decided that Tia Juana shall be the Madrid of America. Seville is too slow for us and Barcelona is too fast. We are striving for a happy medium. We believe we have found it in Madrid. If San Francisco can aspire to be the Paris of America, Tia Juana can surely hope to emulate the splendid accomplishment of the capital of Old Spain."

It will be observed, I hope, that Senor P. H. Macarto speaks in the language of a real hidalgo. He is the jefe of the Union de Carpentieros of Baja California, with headquarters at Tia Juana, and he was elected Alcalde of the city on a reactionary reform movement incited by the attempt of what was called El Buenos Hombres' Cortes to compel the citizens of the pueblo to be good in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Cortes. The Good Men were carrying everything before them in public opinion and they would have captured the town if they had not insisted upon the adoption of the ten commandments without revision, modification or amendment, as the fundamental and constitutional statute of the community. The revolt against this proposition was terrific. The Bull Fighters' Union called a mass meeting and denounced the attempt of the Good Men as an attempt on their part to throttle personal liberty. The Cock Fighters' Union passed resolutions denouncing the pronunciamiento as an invasion of the rights of free Mexican citizens. The unions of the Monte Dealers, the Pulquerias, the Mescleros, the Lottery shops, and the Sons of Rest, organized a campaign against the program of the Uplifters, and choosing Don Patricio Hernandez Macarto as their leader and champion, carried him to victory by an overwhelming majority.

"The people of Tia Juana," Don Patricio continued, "are a pleasure loving community. Tia Juana should be a pleasure resort. We propose to make it so. We are going to be one of the main stations on a great transcontinental railway. We must not only take advantage of our opportunity, but we must realize the great responsibility that lies upon us. We must rehabilitate. These reformers have been hurting business. I shall make it my business to help business by bringing tourists into the town—tourists with money to spend. Los Angeles makes about seven million dollars a season out of the spendthrift tourist. There is no reason why at least five million dollars of that money should not come to Tia Juana. I know of no better way to get this money than by giving the tourist a chance to spend his money as he would spend it in the Paris of America. We would prefer that the tourist should come to Tia Juana unaccompanied by his wife; but if he must be thus encumbered our curio dealers and posada keepers will take care of the wives at the usual rates—there will be some profit even in the ladies. I propose that the cafes and the cafeterias shall run all night, and every cafe will be a dance hall. Our skin games will be in full blast from siesta to any old hour. We will have bullfights every Sunday. There will be something doing all the time. A wheel of fortune and a three card monte game will be established at the depot so that through passengers going East may lose no time in losing their money en route. Concessions have already been let for nine faro games in our municipal red light district. The lights will burn from six to six. I tell you, senor, there will be something doing in this old town every night and something more every day. Tia Juana has decided that she is a hot tamale. She is no longer a cold tortilla, senor, and I hope that you will let the world know what we are doing. The Madrid of America wants all the publicity she can get. Tia Juana is the Madrid of America. She is full of the ginger of the great Southwest mixed with the lime juice of Mexico. And that's a combination you can't beat in your Paris of America. Adios, senor. Come again; our town is yours; we reserve only the furniture. Buenos dias."

I stepped into my automobile and was whirled away dazed by the prospect that Don Patricio had opened to my vision. I looked out over that sun scorched mesa and saw the possibilities of the Alcalde's intention. Everything in the pueblo seemed asleep for it was the hour of the siesta; but I knew that beneath that apparent calm lurked a devilish spirit, a Carmenesque hilarity that must some day find vent. I realized that the manana days are gone in Tia Juana town and that better, livelier days are in store for the old pueblo. Ordinarily I would distrust the ability of Tia Juana to live up to its Madrid of America standard, but since I have talked with Alcalde Macarto I am convinced that there is nothing Tia Juana might attempt that it could not accomplish. If it wants to be the Madrid of America I see no valid reason why it should not get there with both feet and a lot more. I predict that in another year Tia Juana will not only be the Madrid of America but that its suburban adjuncts will be Monte Carlos and Homburgs of America. And I am sure that it will catch the opulent tourist coming and going without difficulty and without shame—sin verguenza.

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll notice the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

This perfection is obtained only by owning your own plantation in Turkey—the careful watchfulness from the seeding to the finished article.

A Voice

By Luigi Pirandello (From the Italian)

Only a few days before her death, the Marchesa Borghi had insisted, more from a sense of duty than anything else, upon consulting even Dr. Giunio Falci on behalf of her only son Silvio, who had been blind for about a year. He had been examined by the most famous oculists of Italy and other countries, and they had all told her that he was suffering from an incurable glaucoma.

Dr. Giunio Falci had quite recently been appointed director of the ophthalmic clinic; but whether on account of his air of chronic weariness and self-absorption, or because of his awkward limbs, his loose, ungainly mode of walking, his big head, prematurely bald, thrust far forward, his long thin nose standing forth from his lean, bony face, like a sail to the wind, his short, scant, bristling beard parting on his chin, and already slightly gray, no one pretended to know; at all events, people found him so unprepossessing that many went to the length of wholly discrediting his professional skill. This he knew, and apparently found it amusing. Day by day, he became more self-centered, seldom rousing himself from his weary absorption except to ask curious, penetrating questions, that chilled and disconcerted. Gradually he had formulated a conception of life so completely stripped of all those intimate and wellnigh indispensable hypocrisies, those spontaneous, inevitable illusions that everyone naturally forms and creates for himself, from an instinctive need to veil, so to speak, the naked truths of social life, that his companionship had become insupportable.

Summoned one morning by the Marchesa Borghi, he had betaken himself along the new, broad, unfrequented avenue, given up wholly to private villas, in the heart of the Fields of Castello, beyond the Margherita Bridge. He had examined attentively and at great length the young man's eyes, without paying any heed, so it seemed, to the long account that the marchesa meanwhile gave him concerning the malady, the opinions of other physicians, the various treatments they had prescribed. Glaucoma? No, it did not seem to him that he found in those eyes the characteristics of that disease, the pale bluish or greenish hue of opaqueness, and the rest. It seemed to him more likely that he had to deal with a rare and strange manifestation of the malady commonly known as cataract. But he decided not to reveal his suspicion too hastily to the mother, for fear of prematurely fostering a fragile hope, when he himself felt so far from sure. Concealing the great interest which this unusual case aroused, he had merely expressed a wish to call and examine the patient again, a few days later.

As a matter of fact, he had called again, but strangely enough, in that new and unfrequented avenue he had found a gaping crowd, before the open gateway of the villa. The Marchesa Borghi had died unexpectedly during the night.

What should he do? Turn and retrace his steps? It occurred to him that if on his first visit he had expressed a belief that the young man's malady was not a case of genuine glaucoma, perhaps the poor mother would have been spared, at her death, the added pang of having to leave her son incurably blind. Well, although it was now too late to offer the mother the consolation of hope, could he not at least greatly comfort the unhappy son, so stricken by this new and unforeseen calamity? Accordingly he passed on and entered the villa.

After waiting a long time, amid the pervading bustle and confusion, he was received by a young woman, dressed in black, fair-haired and reserved, even forbidding in manner, who had been the paid companion of the late Marchesa. Dr. Falci explained to her the object of his visit, which would otherwise have seemed ill-timed. At a certain point, she interrupted him in order to ask, with a touch of wonder that betrayed distrust:

"Are people so young subject to cataract?"

Falci looked her in the eyes for a moment; then, with an ironical smile, that played about his eyes rather than on his lips, he answered:

"And why not? Figuratively, people are always subject to cataract, whenever they fall in love. But even physically, only too often."

Hereupon she cut short the interview, saying that under the circumstances it was really impossible, for the present, to disturb the marchesa on any account; but that as soon as he had somewhat recovered from his grief, she would tell him of the doctor's visit, and undoubtedly he would ask him to call again.

The fact was that the late marchesa had received a most unfavorable impression of the doctor, during his first visit. Her young companion, Lydia Venturi, who had remained as house-keeper and private secretary to the young marchesa, remembered this very clearly. But would not the impression have been very different, had Dr. Falci given the marchesa reason to hope that the recovery of her son was possible? That was a question which Lydia did not care to ask herself; while, for her own part, she regarded the doctor's second visit as savoring of quackery or worse, coming as he did on the very day of the marchesa's death, to express a doubt, to kindle a hope of such a nature.

The young marchesa seemed to have already resigned himself to his bereavement. When his mother was so suddenly taken from him, he seemed to feel, besides the darkness of his blind eyes, as though there had settled down upon his soul another darkness far more terrible, in the presence of which all men are blind. From that darkness, those who have sound eyes may distract their thoughts with the sight of external objects; but he could not. He had been blind in life; he was blind also in the presence of death. And into this other darkness, colder, emptier, more impenetrable, his mother had silently disappeared, leaving him alone in a horrible void.

Suddenly, he knew not clearly whence, a voice of infinite sweetness reached him, like rays of softest light penetrating his twofold gloom. And to this voice his whole soul, groping in that horrible void, had turned and clung.

To him, Lydia Venturi was nothing more than a voice. It was she, more than anyone else, whom his mother had kept beside her, throughout those last few months. And his mother, as he well remembered, in speaking to him of her, always praised her lightly. That was how he knew that she was kind and thoughtful, refined, cultured, intelligent; and all that he now found in the care she lavished on him, the comfort she was able to give him.

From the beginning, Lydia had suspected that the Marchesa Borghi, in taking her into her service was prepared to see no harm—such was her maternal egotism—should her son find the girl, in one way or another, a source of consolation. Lydia had been keenly offended, and had forced herself to exaggerate her natural delicacy into an attitude of forbidding reserve. But after the bereavement, when he had taken her hand in a burst of grief, and resting his pale, handsome face upon it, had besought her: "You're not going to leave me? You're not going to leave me?" she felt herself conquered by compassion and tenderness, and dedicated herself wholly to him.

Before long, with the timid yet insistent and pitiful curiosity of the blind, he fell to torturing her with questions. He wished to "see her," in his darkness; he wished her voice to become a living image within him. They were vague, brief questions, at first. He wished to tell her what he fancied she was like, just from hearing her read and speak.

"You have light hair, haven't you?"

"Yes."

Her hair was light; but coarse and thin, contrasting oddly with the somewhat turbid hue of her complexion. But how could she tell him that? And why?

"And your eyes are blue; aren't they?"

"Yes."

They were blue; but dull and sorrowful, too deeply sunken beneath her grave, sad, projecting brow. How could she tell him that? And why?

Beautiful she certainly was not, in feature; but she had an exquisite figure, at once slender and full of grace. And beautiful beyond question were her hands and her voice—especially her voice. It was a voice of indefinable softness, contrasting sharply with the gloomy, mournful, disagreeable expression of her face.

She knew well enough how he pictured her, thanks to the sorcery of that voice, coupled with the timid answers he elicited by his insistent, repeated questions. And standing in front of her mirror, she would strive to make herself resemble that fictitious image of her, strive to see herself as he saw her in the midst of his darkness. She fell into the habit of thinking of her voice as not issuing from her own lips, but rather from the lips that he attributed to her; and when she laughed, she had a sudden impression of not having really laughed, but of having imitated the laughter of someone else, the laughter of that other self whose only existence was in his fancy.

All of this became a slow and secret torture that played havoc with her nerves. She felt that she was no longer herself, that all her strength of will had gone from her, owing to the pity which this young man had roused within her. Was it only pity? No, at present it was love besides. She no longer had the strength to withdraw her hand from his hand, to turn her face from his face, whenever he drew her too closely to him.

"No, you must not; no indeed you must not," she would protest faintly.

The time had come when a definite answer could no longer be postponed; yet it cost Lydia a long and cruel struggle. The young marchesa had no relatives, either near or distant; he was his own master and free to live his life as he pleased. But would not the world say that she had taken unfair advantage of his calamity to make him marry her, and so acquire wealth and title? Oh yes; surely all this would be said, and more besides. But after all, how could she remain any longer in his house, on any other con-

Phil Stanton, Human Document

That was a very interesting gathering which took place a few evenings ago on the front porch of the home of Mrs. Finkle of West Thirty-first street, Los Angeles. It was a warm evening and Mrs. Finkle was serving iced tea, so Mrs. Wellborn, Mrs. Burger, Mrs. Murray, Mrs. Teague and other neighbors dropped over for a friendly glass and a bit of gossip. As the conversation was reported in full in the Los Angeles Times the presumption is that a reporter from General Otis' paper was also present. The subject of conversation was Phil Stanton, candidate in Los Angeles for governor of California. But it was of Stanton the homebody, not Stanton the politician that the ladies discoursed. Phil's ears must have burned when Mrs. Wellborn said: "Adeline Stanton was over at my house a minute yesterday and was telling me how she was uptown the day her brother came home, and she got a place down near the Stanton headquarters, and when Philip saw her with her niece, he pushed through the crowd to where she was and took the baby up and made over her, just like she was his own child, and the first thing he asked was, 'How's mother?' Now I call that mighty sweet."

They've Made Him Proverbial

Another lady called attention to the fact that Phil has taken one or more of his family on every official trip he has made since he became Speaker and referred admiringly to the fact that he had put his sister on the payroll at Sacramento. Mrs. Finkle declared that the saying, "as good as Phil Stanton is to his mother" had become a proverb in the neighborhood and added: "Honest, if he were made to order he would not be a bit lovelier to his folks." Another of the gossips chimed in with this: "In our family we have always called Philip 'The Fairy Godfather.' We run over to borrow some olive oil or Caroline comes over to use our telephone, and we know a great deal about the family, so I can praise him with a good conscience." It developed that when the Stanton family went to its home at the beach Phil was the personification of industry, even going into the kitchen to cook and serve so that his mother might rest and the girls would not have to work so hard. Before the party broke up somebody remarked that Philip did not like to be talked about, particularly in his home affairs, whereupon Mrs. Finkle replied: "Well, he's entirely too modest for his own good; my husband says so." All of which justifies the Times in the grave declaration that Philip, the mother's boy is the people's man. But really, Philip is more than that; he's a great human document and should be filed in the State archives.

Father and Daughter, a Hotel Drama

Everybody in San Francisco is presumed to know the Hart brothers, Sid and Abe and Harry. Sid used to be a wine agent and when Willie O'Connor succeeded him, devoted his business talents to a well known whiskey. Abe and Harry are money brokers and do the lightering for the Pacific Mail. Abe Hart will be surprised to know that he is the hero of the present drama. He was sitting in the "peacock alley" of the St. Francis one night last week when Mr. C. L. Hertzman who is manager for Henrietta Crossman passed by in company with his charming wife. Mrs. Hertzman looked at Hart as she passed and leaving her husband went quickly to one of the hotel staff and inquired with considerable trepidation who the gentleman was, indicating Abe Hart. When told his name she said: "I knew it! That's my father and I haven't seen him since I was four years old." It developed that Abe Hart was estranged from his wife when his daughter, the present Mrs. Hertzman, was only four years of age. A divorce followed and the daughter was brought up in the home of her stepfather. She never saw her father until last week. The Hertzmans were at the St. Francis for five weeks and during that time Mrs. Hertzman frequently noticed a strange gentleman watching her with rapt attention. Just what old memories were working in the minds of father and daughter during that time it would be difficult to say, but at any rate it was the daughter who established the relationship. But she never mustered the courage to inform her father who she was and although some strange attraction caused him to follow her with his eyes whenever she was near, Abe Hart never learned that she was his daughter.

Nat's Little Celebration

Nat Goodwin was in town the other day to celebrate his fifty-third birthday and to show that he is still as young as the rest of us he made the occasion one of youthful indiscretion. He intended to leave in the evening for Los Angeles but so frequently was he the recipient of liquid congratulations that he forgot that the Lark—appropriate name!—left at eight and it was ten o'clock before he reached the depot. Naturally he hurried back to the Rialto to continue the convivial celebration which he justified in this fashion: "Edna's in Europe, isn't she? And Nat's in San Francisco, isn't he? Well, then, how will Edna in Europe know that Nat in San Francisco is taking a night off?" Goodwin's companions immediately voted him the greatest logician of the age and joined him in a dozen rounds of highballs. Both Goodwin and Harry McMillan, his rival for the hand of Edna Goodrich, were stopping at the St. Francis, but McMillan was not among Nat's boon companions.

Two street sweepers were cleaning refuse from Market street.

"Awfully hot," said one.

"Terrible," replied the other. "It takes all the ambition out of a man."

Hiram, Teddy and the Bulletin

He who tells a lie undertakes a great task; for to maintain it he must invent twenty more. Thus we find our incorrigible contemporary the Boughten Bulletin exercising its inventive faculty to the limit of its capacity in vain efforts to give color to its original falsehood about the sympathy and encouragement the Hon. Hiram Johnson was receiving from Colonel Roosevelt. When this lie was nailed the boughten journal proceeded to imitate the ostrich. Its second lie was its suppression of the news. It did not publish Colonel Roosevelt's disavowal of the report that he had sent Gifford Pinchot to California to campaign for the standard bearer of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. Instead it lured the Colonel into correspondence in the hope of eliciting from him something that might be construed to suit its purpose. But the Colonel only gave emphasis to his original message, explaining at the same time why he had taken the trouble to set himself right. The Bulletin found among his utterances on sentence from which it pretended to derive consolation and which, with characteristic indecency it extracted from the text in the vain hope of giving verisimilitude to its hodgepodge of prevarications. Of course the sinister aim of the shallow editor is obvious; he seeks to cloud the issue. But the question remains visible in its pristine clarity. The question is not whether Colonel Roosevelt sympathizes with Hiram Johnson. Though he has not said so I am convinced that if he knew Hiram he would be fond of him. Hiram and Teddy have many traits and instincts in common. But there is no question of community of interests and tastes to be discussed. The question is, "Did Mr. Johnson and his friend (Older, Rowell and all the rest of the fragrant crew) proclaim to the world the falsehood that the Colonel had espoused the cause of the standard-bearer of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League?"

He Has Lost His Goat

The Bulletin ought not to be held strictly accountable for all that it says nowadays. The editor has lost his goat. When a man loses his goat he says and does all sorts of foolish things. The Bulletin editor's goat was recently lassoed by the publisher of the Post. Of this I became aware when I read an hysterical editorial in the Bulletin accusing the Post of lying about its circulation. Not so long ago the editor of the Bulletin, notwithstanding his inordinate love of money, could not have been hired to discuss the Post's circulation. He used to scoff at the Post privately. In those days his goat seemed to be well in hand. But as soon as he lost his goat he took to the housetops to challenge the claims of the Post's circulation manager. Thereupon everybody in the newspaper business became aware that the Bulletin's circulation had fallen below that of the Post.

The Lambasting of Lawlor

The scene that occurred last Wednesday in the presence of justice, or rather in the presence of its most wonderful and incredible incarnation of justice, is perhaps unprecedented in the history of American jurisprudence. It is very much to be lamented. Nothing can be more deplorable than the manifestation on the part of reputable members of the legal profession of hearty and sincere contempt for a minister of justice. Attorneys are under no greater, no more sacred obligation than that of respect for the dignity of the judiciary; and for neglect of it seldom can justification be conceived. And while there have been many instances of transgression against the dignity of the court on the part of attorneys, it may be doubted whether there can be found of record a case of a more enthusiastic and impassioned challenge of juridical integrity than that which was made in Judge Lawlor's court by Stanley Moore, A. A. Moore and J. J. Barrett, men of the very highest standing at the bar. One after another these men accused Judge Lawlor to his face of dragging his ermine in the mire. Now it is conceivable that so grave an accusation would have been made by these attorneys had they a titilla of doubt as to its truth. And I must confess that after having read the remarkable utterances that provoked the indignation of the attorneys I am constrained to sympathize with them fully as much as with the indiscreet judge who precipitated a most unfortunate situation against the background of which he presented a most piteous spectacle. To me it seems that entirely too much has been expected of Judge Lawlor by the civic patriots who have been personally conducting justice in this city. It ought to have been enough for them that he kept the Calhoun case hanging fire. Under the pretext of justifying his course he should not have been expected to make rumor and suspicion serve as the basis of a lot of calumnious flubdub and affect to be unconscious of affirmative testimony which disproved all his innuendoes and shattered all his conjectures. Judge Lawlor appears to have lost his cunning, and at any rate he certainly lost his head when the lawyers began lambasting him, for his behaviour was at once ludicrous and pathetic as he vacated his coward's castle in a panic and in bewilderment looked for an avenue of escape.

Dick Ferris, Politician

A political meeting presided over by Clarence Webb, Dutch comedian, whereat a couple of hundred men applauded select vaudeville stunts while they smoked good free cigars and drank good free whiskey was the innovation for which Dick Ferris of Los Angeles was responsible last week. It is true that the affair was characterized in the invitations as a "vaudeville smoker" but the crowd which gathered in the ball room of the St. Francis Hotel did not need the hint of gorgeous banners and campaign buttons to remind them that it was actually a political gathering. It is a long time since any candidate for office tackled the job of winning the primary in the fashion of Dick Ferris. Ferris is not a politician and on that account he is doing mighty good politics in his original methods of pursuing the lieutenant-governorship. Nobody has much to say in political meetings any more. Political oratory attracts attention when it is spectacular, but its vote-getting powers are extremely limited. Charles James Fox's famous assertion: "I have heard many speeches that changed my mind but never a speech that changed my vote," applies with peculiar force to present day political conditions. But when an office-seeker provides a crowd with good entertainment and extra good Scotch, to say nothing of the cigars, he is pretty apt to make a hit and win a good many votes. I do not remember any candidate for political office who ever did before just what Dick Ferris did at the St. Francis last Thursday night and it will be interesting to check up the results of the "vaudeville smoker" on the day after election. Dick Ferris is about the liveliest live wire that Los Angeles boasts—witness his marked success in politics of the "good fellow" principle is worthy of consideration by the politicians who are sufficiently up-to-date to entertain healthy doubts as to the efficacy of the old cut-and-dried maneuvers for enticing votes.

A Native Son Joke

On my way into the St. Francis on the occasion of the Dick Ferris entertainment I met ex-justice me with a red and watery eye. "Leaving so early, judge?" I queried. "Yes," answered the former justice, "I am on my way to the nearest drug store to have my eye treated. Before the aviation meet—and his introduction into of the peace Barry coming out and he regarded tending the Ferris smoker I went to a banquet given by Stanford Parlor of the Native Sons and I had no sooner entered the banquet room than I was hit in the eye with a loaf of bread." Thus do the playful Natives indulge their genius for harmless and laugh-provoking jocularities.

The Simoneau Stevenson Sold

Everybody who is familiar with the life and works of Robert Louis Stevenson knows all about old Jules Simoneau who used to make those famous tamales when the invalid Scotchman went to live in the old Spanish town and who so captivated the exile that he was listed among R.L.S.'s lifelong friends. Time and time again articles have been written about the volumes of fiction and essays which Stevenson sent to old Simoneau as they successively appeared, all bearing his autograph and messages testifying to his warm friendship. Admirers of Stevenson who visited Monterey were wont to call on old Jules and pay respectful attention to the stories for the sake of a peep at the treasured collection. During Simoneau's lifetime it was impossible to buy that set of Stevenson. Eastern publishing houses, notably Scribner and Dodd Mead, offered tempting sums for it but the old tamale vendor stoutly refused to put a price on the memorial of his friendship, notwithstanding that he was very poor. But old Jules Simoneau is gone now and his heirs have at last parted with the great family treasure. The Simoneau collection of Stevenson's books has passed into the hands of Mr. A. A. Brown of this city, who besides being a well known financier is an ardent and expert book collector. I am given to understand that Mr. Brown paid nearly one thousand dollars for the collection. This collection of course is unique and there is no way of estimating its value. It is really worth whatever the collector is willing to pay for it. I have heard of only one other collection of Stevenson's works that compared with it and that is no longer in existence. When Stevenson was at Saranac Lake he met a Dr. Trudeau who lived there and the two became fast friends. Stevenson corresponded with him after leaving and sent him his books as they were published. Each volume contained a couplet and when the set was complete the couplets taken together formed a very graceful poem. The verses have been preserved but the set of books was destroyed when Dr. Trudeau's cottage was burned.

He Saw Broderick Fall

I had the pleasure recently of meeting one of the two living men who were present at the fatal meeting between Senator Broderick and Judge Terry. This man was Mr. Pressley Corbin Hyman of Elko, Nevada. Hyman who is nearly eighty years of age belongs to a family which was originally English but for many generations has been identified with South Carolina. He was born in Georgia and arrived in San Francisco December 1, 1849, on the Steamer Oregon. The Oregon carried a distinguished company including George W. Grayson, the father-in-law of W. C. Ralston, Joseph Eastland, Jack Gamble who used to run the Seventeen Mile House, Tom Maguire of the Maguire Opera House and James King of William, at that time making his second trip to San Francisco. When the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board was organized in 1862 Colonel Hyman, as he is best known, was one of the charter members. He is the last survivor of the original forty charter members. When he visited the Board in Bush street recently he was accorded an ovation. Although Colonel Hyman now resides in comfort at Elko with his wife and family, his affiliations are almost entirely Californian. The great men of the early days were his intimate friends. In politics and otherwise he was closely associated with Senator Broderick for whom he cherishes an almost passionate devotion. In fact Colonel Hyman typifies in the flesh that tremendous influence which Senator Broderick exerted over thousands by the sheer force of his personality.

Efforts to Stop the Duel

Colonel Hyman made it clear to me that a little less stiff-necked obstinacy on the part of Broderick's friends would have saved his life, for Judge Terry was not over-anxious to fight him. Two men well known on the Comstock, John Nugent and Joseph Baldwin, did everything in their power to call off the meeting. Colonel Hyman tells of a meeting at which he was present and at which Nugent produced a letter written by himself but signed by Judge Terry in which the judge subscribed to the statement that the remarks which he had made about Broderick were not meant in a personal but in a political sense. Nugent showed this letter to A. J. Butler, a brother of the general, who acted as one of Broderick's seconds, but Butler refused to deliver it to his principal, saying: "I would rather see Broderick go back to Washington a corpse than without fighting this duel." Feeling themselves rebuffed Nugent and Baldwin desisted, taking it for granted that Broderick insisted on fighting. Colonel Hyman believes that if the letter had been delivered Broderick's honor would have been satisfied and the meeting would never have occurred. Thus was the whole course of early California history directed by the non-delivery of a letter.

Was He Victimized?

One of Colonel Hyman's statements revives a controversy which raged with extreme bitterness immediately after Broderick's death and which has been noticed in all accounts of the duel. Colonel Hyman says that he was with Broderick on the ground when the little gunsmith who had loaded Broderick's pistol handed it to him with the words: "It's light." Colonel Hyman is of the opinion that Broderick took his remark to mean that the pistol was light in weight, for he seemed to be hefting it, but as a matter of fact the gunsmith referred to the trigger. In this connection a statement recorded in Major Ben Truman's "The Field of Honor" is important. It is to the effect that the trigger of Broderick's weapon was so light that it could be snapped by the breath of a strong man. Broderick was considered a dead shot and when the ground was examined after the duel it was found that he had made a perfect line shot, but that the bullet had struck the ground two feet in front of Terry. This fact would indicate that the trigger of his weapon was so light that the weapon exploded before Broderick could bring it from a vertical to a horizontal position. The question is, Was Broderick victimized by means of a pistol with a too-light hair trigger? There always have been and always will be men to say that he was, but the argument can never be definitely decided.

Broderick's Irritation

Colonel Hyman told me that in a former duel Broderick had told his opponent who was divesting himself, according to the code, of all metallic substances, to retain his watch and die like a gentleman. So they fought with their watches on and Broderick's life was saved because his opponent's ball struck his timepiece. This was a lasting source of humiliation to Broderick. He was a sensitive man and felt keenly what he came to regard as his violation of the code, the more especially as it enabled his enemies to accuse him of cowardice. So in the meeting at the Laguna de la Merced when Calhoun Bennet, one of Terry's seconds, went to Broderick and felt all over his person carefully, to ascertain whether he had kept anything metallic, Broderick felt the insulted and became very irritated. Colonel Hyman says that he remonstrated with Bennet for what he had done but the latter said he had done it with no ulterior motive but merely on the spur of the moment. Hyman, however, still thinks that it was done to irritate Broderick and to unnerve him for the duel.

The Death of Broderick

Colonel Hyman was in the carriage which conveyed the dying senator to the Haskell house at Black Point. He says he put his hand to the spot where Broderick had been hit, but the latter implored him in great agony, "For God's sake, take your hand away." He was bleeding profusely and after he had been chloroformed and the ball found just beneath the skin the attending physician stated that if it had been taken out immediately after the duel he might have had a better chance to live. Colonel Hyman was among the last to leave Broderick who squeezed his hand and said: "Good bye, Hyman." In the

The Fight for Broderick's Estate

Senator Broderick's estate was worth $300,000 and it became the subject of a most remarkable conspiracy which was partly aired in the courts. It was always thought that Broderick had no heirs but his papers showed that he had an aunt in Ireland. A. J. Butler, his second, decided to buy out this aunt's interest in the estate and he requested his friend William Willis to go to Ireland for this purpose. Willis was ready to start when a Broderick will was produced. In this document the better part of the estate was left to George Wilkes, a close friend of Broderick. Colonel Hyman indicated what had happened by stating that a sheet of paper containing two purported signatures of Broderick had been brought to him with the request that he state which was the more characteristic. He indicated one and secretly marked it. The will, he declares, was forged over that signature on the same sheet of paper. With the new developments Willis would have nothing to do and his testimony afterwards reflected severely on the activities of Butler and others. Meanwhile Colonel Hyman had sent a man to Ireland with $5,000 to buy out the aunt, but he was too late. She had already sent her son here and he enlisted the assistance of the public administrator. Suit was brought to set aside the will but the Supreme Court finally decided that the will should be probated. Meanwhile David D. Colton and William R. Garrison had bought the interest of George Wilkes and the estate was finally divided between McDonald, the son of Broderick's aunt, Colton, Garrison and a lawyer named Erwin Davis. Moses Flannagan, a politician, confessed on his death bed that he had forged the will.

"Has your husband a strong will?
"My dear! His will is incontestable."

Spalding Going the Route

Mr. A. G. Spalding, "Father of Baseball," banker, manufacturer of sporting goods, millionaire and public spirited citizen, spent a few days in town this week learning the curves of what is to him a new game—the game of politics. Under the tutelage and ciceronage of Judge Thomas Graham, President of the California Baseball League, Mr. Spalding exhibited what seemed to be an instinct for the arcana of the sport. It was with great reluctance that Mr. Spalding yielded to the pressure that was brought to bear on him to forswear the tranquillity of private life and brave the storms and stress of a political career, but after a few days of experience as a "mixer" among the captains of the sovereign people he confessed he never had so much exhilaration since he quit the diamond. Campaigning for office is not usually regarded as an exhilarating pastime. But Mr. Spalding has no anxieties to affect his nerves. Having sporting blood in his veins he is eager to win, but he has no consuming passion for office. This is a case of the office taking the initiative; and the quiescent citizen rousing himself to action from a sense of duty, a most uncommon state of affairs in American politics. And now that he is in the race Mr. Spalding is going some. A man of an amiable, effervescent temperament, genial, adaptable and magnetic, a keen and impressionable observer, he is an ideal vote-getter. With Judge Graham he circulated in all circles, meeting men in every walk of life, mingling with athletes in the Olympic Club and grave men of affairs in the Chamber of Commerce, and everywhere he went he was pronounced an ideal man for the Senate, one capable at once of leavening that august body with a sense of humor and contributing to its fund of common sense and business ability.

Bryan's Solitary Friend

The unhorsing of William Jennings Bryan in the Grand Island convention reminds me of a story that has often been told by Governor Shallenberger of Nebraska who had a hand in the recent humiliation of the peerless one. Before Bryan started on his South American tour Governor Shallenberger met him and asked him if he wanted any of his friends taken care of in patronage jobs during his absence. Bryan considered a minute and explained that it would be impossible for him to take his valet with him and that he would be glad to see him installed in some job. The governor promised to look after him and in recounting the incident afterwards moralized upon it thus: "Just think of it! Bryan has been twice in Congress and three times a candidate for the presidency and yet at the present time there is only one man in the State of Nebraska whom he desires to befriend."

Birdie Vanderbilt's Divorce

With unusual persistence the rumor that Mrs. Willie K. Vanderbilt Jr. is on the point of applying to the divorce courts has bobbed up time and time again despite the most emphatic denials. When Mrs. Vanderbilt was last in this city that rumor had the unpleasant quality associated with Banquo's ghost and it was currently gossiped that Mrs. Vanderbilt intended to establish a residence in Reno. The strongest argument in rebuttal of this chatter was found in Mrs. Vanderbilt's religious faith and it was apparently taken for granted that the breach between herself and her husband was too wide to be bridged. And now on the authority of the Washington Mirror we have it that Mrs. Vanderbilt contemplates divorce but that she will seek a separation, not in Reno but in Rhode Island. We are told that she has completed arrangements to go to Newport after returning from Europe in September and that as a two years' residence is necessary for the securing of a Rhode Island divorce she will remain there for that length of time. It is said that Mrs. Oelrichs wants her to make her home at Rose Cliff but that Mrs. Vanderbilt prefers a smaller place and one not so exposed to the sea.

Her Reckless Husband

From the Buffalo Truth I have culled additional facts which indicate that Mrs. Vanderbilt has found married life extremely unpleasant. This paper says that Willie has broken his wife's heart and that he has awakened to a tardy realization of this fact. "After a month spent in idleness, luxury and wild self-indulgence," says this paper, "William K. Vanderbilt Jr. has decided to go to work and has signified his intention of taking up and mastering the railroad business." Mention too is made of his alleged attentions to Madame Polaire, press-agented as the ugliest woman on the stage, attentions which are said to have scandalized Paris. This latter statement, however, may be taken with a grain of salt. I learn further that Mrs. Oelrichs is credited with saying that the Vanderbilt children have forgotten that they ever had a father. They are with their mother constantly and she is passionately devoted to them.

Mrs. Judge Coyne Married

A cable has been received by some of the friends of Mrs. "Judge" Coyne in the divorce colony of Reno announcing her marriage at the Savoy in London to Thomas W. Ryley of Florodora fame. Fisher and Ryley, it will be remembered, managed the famous Florodora company which so speedily gave its sextet of beauties to American millionairessdom and the British peerage. Ryley made a fortune out of the Owen Hall musical comedy and lost it with the "Silver Slipper," but I believe he has since recouped and will be able to maintain his bride in the lavish fashion to which she has been accustomed. Mrs. Coyne was very well known in San Francisco. Judge Coyne was formerly an attorney for the Metropolitan street roads in New York but came out to the coast to take a hand in the famous Dunsmuir litigation. When Mrs. Coyne joined the divorce colony at Reno she infused a degree of vivacity into its entertainments which has not been equaled since.

She Was Popular Here

But Mrs. Coyne was not content to confine herself to the society of Reno. She liked to run down to San Francisco for occasional diversion and never failed to find it. She is a petite woman of graceful figure and unusual personal charm and her elaborate gowns were noted wherever she went—and she went nearly everywhere. Always there was a group of gallants in her train among whom the rollicking member of a family of bankers was conspicuous. He made her acquainted with the intricacies of Chinatown and sped her on several occasions to the joys of the beach resorts. One evening in the tapestry room of the St. Francis he introduced a new fashion in polite conversation by sitting on the back of a chair with his feet gracefully disposed on the damask and holding a sprightly chat with her in that difficult position. Since her departure for Europe Mrs. Coyne has been the innocent cause of a rumpus which was witnessed by a number of guests in the fashionable Alexandria Hotel of Los Angeles. The principals were a world-famous prizefight promoter and his wife. Mrs. Prizefight Promoter taxed her husband with having lavished undue attentions on Mrs. Coyne and his protestations to the contrary precipitated quite a scene.

To Manipulate the Hobble Skirt

From a friend who has just returned from Paris I learned considerable about that latest atrocity of feminine fashion, the hobble skirt. It seems that the Parisian women attempt very little walking in the hobble and have adopted a remarkable method of freeing their nether limbs from its confinement whenever the opportunity offers. This method lends itself particularly to the privacy of a limousine or taxicab, but would be decidedly out of place in the crystal car of Mrs. William Miller Graham which I described last week. When a lady in the hobble skirt enters her closed car she immediately finds comparative comfort by drawing the skirt up to her knees. The effect is decidedly shocking to our frontier notions of propriety and convention and I can see some of our not-too-prudish maids and matrons blushing at the very thought of such a thing, but I only tell what I have heard and my veracious informant assures me that the arrangement is decidedly piquant. He says that as Parisian ladies are artists in the choice of boots, hosiery and—ssh!—garters, this manipulation of the hobble is—but why pursue the subject?

The Hobble is Dangerous

That the hobble skirt is an extremely dangerous garment to women who are not absolutely sure-footed may be inferred from a very cursory study of the uncertain gait which it necessitates. It was the cause of a very serious accident in front of the St. Francis Hotel a few nights ago. A lady wearing a hobble skirt which was just a little more hobbly than any other that I have seen was leaving the hotel with a gentleman after dinner. As she crossed the sidewalk to her automobile on the arm of her escort she tripped and despite his efforts to save her, fell on the curbing. When she was lifted to her feet the bridge of her nose was broken and she was unconscious. With the assistance of the concierge her escort placed her in the machine and raced off to a doctor. I do not think that woman can be very enthusiastic about the hobble skirt, unless she is a more willing martyr to fashion than the average woman.

The Slenderness of Tessie

Recent photographs of Mrs. Herman Oelrichs show her to be as slight and lithe as her sister Mrs. Vanderbilt whose slender proportions were a surprise to her California friends. Both daughters of the house of Fair were formerly of the well-rounded Hebe type of beauty but slimmness became the vogue and they have acquired it. On her last visit to San Francisco Mrs. Oelrichs was engaged in a gallant struggle to reduce her weight and she never relaxed her efforts. A rigid diet was adhered to and there were daily walking excursions in the Park. Indeed, she confided to a friend, she walked whenever she went out to wherever she was bound. Her latest portrait taken with her son Herman Jr., a youth of 18, shows the result of the campaign, a slight girlish figure without hips of which any debutante might be proud.

The Calhoun-Foster Rumor

Whenever occasion arises Mrs. Patrick Calhoun, Miss Margaret Calhoun and all the Calhouns deny that any engagement exists between Miss Margaret and Paul Foster of the Fair Hills clan. The denials have been frequent of late owing to many amiable inquiries and in spite of them friends of the young people are inclined to think there will be an announcement before the Calhouns depart for Cleveland. At the Nichols-Mills wedding last June both officiated and the devotion of the handsome usher to the pretty bridesmaid was commented upon. Since then they have been much together and while Miss Calhoun and Martha Foster are intimate friends this can scarcely explain the open admiration of Miss Foster's brother for his sister's chum. Paul Foster is the second son of the A. W. Fosters of San Rafael which may be called a marrying family. His elder brother William became a benedick at the early age of 23 and two sisters, Mrs. Lawrence Draper and Mrs. Henry Keuchler married in their second seasons. Margaret Calhoun like her sister Martha is very popular in the younger set which is hoping that rumor may be true and that she will return to California a bride.

Young Teddy's Domicile

When it was announced that the young Teddy Roosevelts had chosen the Spreckels mansion on Pacific avenue for their future home many remarks were made by those who are always overjoyed to find excuse for criticism. Theodore Jr. and his bride were said to have displayed very bad taste in attempting to start life, as it were, in one of the show houses of the city. It argued a love of display and a desire to impress San Francisco with their importance. Unfortunately for them the critics were confounded by a correction of this report. The Roosevelts have taken a modest cottage adjoining the Spreckels residence, which happens also to be owned by Mr. Spreckels. The Jolliffe family occupied it for several years, leaving it to move into their new home in Broadway and since then it has been occupied by several tenants. A sun dial on the lawn and an iron knocker on the front door have long been distinguishing features of the place which was built when sun dials and knockers were considered evidence of a cultured taste.

Miss Gregg Wears Orchids

Since her return from Europe Miss Enid Gregg has been wearing orchids. Before she went abroad Miss Gregg wore orchids and there were in consequence, and for other reasons, rumors of her engagement to a prominent young bachelor. These have been revived and among the impending announcements is said to be that of their betrothal. They were guests at a luncheon given recently at the Palace when Miss Gregg was strikingly handsome in a gown of some dull clinging black stuff with a huge black hat and the ever-present orchids making a note of delicate color in the costume. The statement that this attractive California girl turned down a title in Paris is not surprising. Most charming American girls who go to Paris do the same thing. Some of them annex the titles, but few there are who may not become viscountesse, baroness, countess and, less frequently perhaps, duchesse or princess if they will. Only a few months ago an Austrian Count traveled over sea and land to lay his heart and title at the feet of a pretty San Francisco girl whom he had known in Nice, and had a journey home again for his pains. Most readers of the yellow press believe that all rich American girls wish to marry titled foreigners and it would probably be a pity to disillusion them—if it were possible to do so.

The Robinson Rileys

A traveling Californian writes me that he has recently met the Robinson Rileys at St. Jean Du Doigt, Finisterre, and that they are supremely happy. Society is familiar with the romance of the Robinson Rileys. Mrs. Robinson Riley was beautiful Genevieve Goad who married Andrew Martin, the son of Mrs. Eleanor Martin and achieved with him a brief felicity. When he died the widow went abroad and joined the Murphys in Paris at the time that Addie Murphy, now Mrs. Breckenridge, was engaged to Mr. Robinson Riley. The story goes that one day under pretext of a severe headache Mrs. Martin kept her apartment while the Murphys attended a musicale. Young Riley also absented himself from the function. When the Murphys returned they found that in their absence Mrs. Martin had exchanged her widow's weeds for orange blossoms, young Riley being the groom. Riley was several years younger than his wife and it was freely predicted that the marriage would not be a happy one. My correspondent's statement of their devotion bears out other stories that I have heard and shows how completely Dame Rumor has been disappointed. All the Goad girls were gifted with great beauty. Aileen married C. K. McIntosh, then a young bank clerk. Ella married Osgood Hooker. Frank Goad, the only brother, is still a bachelor.

The Hall McAllisters Separated

From the East word has come to me that Hall McAllister and his wife have separated. Mrs. Hall McAllister is at her home in Boston and her children are with her while Hall is in New York where his success as an actor has not been particularly encouraging. Hall McAllister's father always intended that his son should follow in his footsteps and become a distinguished lawyer, but young Hall had little taste for the profession. He fell in love with a beautiful girl who was a stenographer in his father's office and when she went on the stage he followed her, but his attentions were repulsed. Then he married a Boston girl. Their married life was happy for a time but they have reached the parting of the ways.

Her Figure Exploded

If you examine the smart shop windows in Grant avenue you will find one in which is displayed the very latest contrivance for giving women who are not endowed with good figures the perfect appearance of voluptuous maturity. Admirable feminine throngs have gazed in this shop window to study the contrivance for several days. When a woman wears one of these contrivances you cannot tell the difference between her sham figure and the real thing—unless an accident happens. And an accident did happen at the St. Francis Hotel the other day. A very handsome woman of exquisite figure was joined in "peacock alley" by a gentleman of prepossessing appearance. They had a dinner engagement and the gentleman suggested that before dining he would like to buy his lady fair a corsage bouquet. The lady fair demurred but the gentleman insisted in a very gallant way, so the couple repaired to the flower stand where a bunch of sweet peas was selected. Now Miss Rose Cohn who has charge of the flower stand is a very obliging young woman and she leaned over the counter to pin the sweet peas to the lady fair's gown, using the customary deadly weapon which is about half as long as a hatpin. How should Miss Cohn know that the lady of exquisite figure was wearing one of those new fangled affairs? She didn't, but she learned it with startling suddenness, for there was a noise like the explosion of a toy balloon, the lady screamed, her escort gasped with surprise and the elevator boy stared when a wilted figure dashed into the lift and demanded between blushes and hysterics to be taken to the lady's dressing room.

Why not send her a box of candy while on her vacation? She would be so pleased. An order left at Geo. Haas & Sons will be carefully filled and immediately sent by mail or express. Four conveniently located stores: Phelan Building, Fillmore at Ellis, Van Ness at Sutter and 28 Market St., near Ferry.

One of the most pleasant events of the summer season was the picnic given at Hope ranch by Mrs. W. S. Porter and William O'Connor of San Francisco. The tables were spread beneath the large oaks at the picnic grounds in the canyon and a more beautiful spot could not be imagined.

Mrs. Frank Deering has returned to her home in the north after being the hostess of several pretty affairs at the Potter.

A Play in the Provinces

By Theodore Bonnet

Down in the balmy, fructulose valley of Santa Clara from Los Altos the new paradise of commuters even unto Los Gatos of the vine-clad foothills, folk are talking of Mr. Herbert Bashford's new play "The Woman He Married." Perhaps you never heard of Mr. Bashford. And of course if you are not of the prune belt it is not to be supposed that you have heard of his new play. But not at present does it argue yourself unknown to confess your unacquaintance with Mr. Bashford. In the days to come, however, the confession may be conclusive of your obscurity and your isolation from the flow of vital thought and the centres of intellectual activity. For while the author of "The Woman He Married" is young his play is more than pregnant with promise; it is the work of a man who has acquired something approximating mastery of his art. I went to see this play out of curiosity, indulging the supercilious notion that what was evoking the superlatives of encomium in a provincial barn equipped as a theater, where prices range from ten to thirty cents, would doubtless revolt my cultivated and fastidious taste. But no such calamity occurred at the "Garden Theater." Quite to the contrary. Mr. Bashford gripped me from the going up of the curtain, and held me in thrall to the very climax of the last of the four acts. Some of our most successful playwrights have failed to do as much; even when they were enjoying the advantages which are incident to perfect craftsmanship in the manipulation of material. At the Garden a play is not presented with all the cunning that is required to help a deficient imagination. Here there are no tricks of light and magic of music; nothing to produce illusion and atmosphere. Nor are the players of surpassing skill in the subtleties and niceties of their art. Nevertheless the Bashford play compels one's interest and produces conviction of its sincerity. The theme of the play is one of universal interest—the subtle, inevitable mischief of a wife's deception of her husband practiced for his benefit without his knowledge. It is the same theme, if my recollection serves me, that Ibsen deals with in "The Doll's House." But there is no similarity in the stories. The Bashford story is a mighty good one. The wife assists her husband by posing for an artist, by whom she is not only respected but loved, the artist being unaware that she is married. With the money that his wife gives him, and which he believes to have been borrowed from a friend, the husband's anxieties resulting from his poverty are extinguished, and he is able to devote himself to the writing of a play which proves a great success. On the very night of his triumph he learns of his wife's deception, and the arch passion of jealousy flames up in a quiescent soul. A powerful situation is this which comes with technical precision and perfect logical sequence in the third act; but Mr. Bashford, unlike Mr. Pinero and the other disciples of the Sardou school, does not content himself with one big act. Quick and moving in its palpitating fiber his play is warm in color of circumstance and rich in episode from beginning to end. It fairly acts itself. The second act in the artist's studio is one that is as thrilling in its situations as it is captivating in the poetry of its atmosphere, and the suspense rises steadily and smoothly to the very wind-up. "The Woman He Married" may justly be characterized as a strong play. A play that tells a good story, a story vital in its appeal, is always a strong play unless the material is badly manipulated. Mr. Bashford has handled his material well; that is, he has handled the inspired episodes logically. That he has exhausted its potentialities, or that he has written a play to be given unstinted praise for dexterity of construction, delicacy of touch, and grace of adornment I will not affirm. I will only say that it has no defects that cannot be easily remedied. One leaves the theater after a performance that has impressed, conscious of the tantalizing feeling that the play is here and there lacking in finesse. Even during the performance one realizes, as for example, in the first act, when to yield the stage to two women, one actor proposes to another that they go into an adjoining room to take a drink, that a little more imagination might be judiciously exercised in devising expedients to give naturalness to exits and entrances. At times the dialogue does not ring true, and there is an occasional false note in the conduct of characters. But these are trivial defects that can be easily effaced. My only quarrel with Mr. Bashford is on the score of his amiable acceptance of the worn-out formula that calls for the O-let's-be-joyful picture at the close of his play. It seems to me that the wife should either have emulated Nora or required her husband to vindicate his repentance.

The Immorality of "The Spendthrift"

By Edward F. O'Day

My imagination may have played me a trick at the Columbia on Monday night but during the progress of "The Spendthrift" I fancied that many of the first nighters about me were glowing with virtuous resolve. It seemed to me that some of the sumptuously upholstered ladies were debating the advisability of giving their maids notice and curbing their weakness for bridge. Some of the elegantly tailored gentlemen, it struck me, were making up their minds to resign from a club or two and cut their wine bills in half. I could almost swear that a score of fashionable modistes, milliners and haberdashers trembled on the verge of ruin during the first three acts; that San Francisco's reputation as the Paris of America was quivering in the balance; and that there was a disastrous slump in the quotations on Purple and Fine Linen Consolidated. I shuddered at the gloomy outlook for cakes and ale. In my mind's eye I saw the elimination of all pleasant vices and the future loomed drearily in sackcloth and ashes. But before the evening was over I realized that Porter Emerson Browne was not the prophet to metamorphose this wicked metropolis to a chastened Nineveh. The first shock of the awakening came when I noted that the normal percentage of shirt fronts were being rumpled in the wild dash for the buffet, but the complete disillusionment was effected when I emerged into Geary street. It was evident that the call of the midnight appetite had not been silenced by the preachments from the stage and that there was to be no slighting of the casserole and the wine-cooler. I did not notice that the awakened conscience dismissed its chauffeur to hail the plebeian street car. I failed to discover any indication that the hobble skirt was ashamed of itself, that taffeta had lost its usual envious feeling toward embroidered satin or that everwear would not have preferred to be silk. And then I began to see, as in a glass darkly, that Mr. Porter Emerson Browne had written a very immoral play, because he had tricked his audience for an hour or so into a sentimental attachment for a false moral system. I perceived that the effect produced upon the spectators was not an awakening of conscience but an emotional stirring; that it was not the purest ray serene of virtue but the artful glamor of the playhouse which had glowed upon the brows of my neighbors. I concluded that there was nothing quite so immoral as a false code of morals and cast about for reasons to justify the conclusion. Being somewhat enamored of the conclusion I naturally had no difficulty in finding reasons to support it. I saw that "The Spendthrift" was full of them. Here was an extravagant, vain and silly wife who would hypothecate her virtue for twenty thousand dollars rather than accommodate her desires to her husband's income. One might suppose that there was something basically defective about such a woman's character and many of the sophisticated would approve the supposition. But because the wisest of us know hardly anything about the feminine mind it would be safer not to go so far. Let us then stop short at the supposition that the woman's oblique moral vision was merely in need of correction. Surely it takes some time to cure that sort of strabismus. But Mr. Porter Emerson Browne is a specialist of thaumaturgic powers. He cures the wife offhand by a treatment of mild suffering, as he had already cured her sister whose condition was not so desperate by having her read a novel. Neither novels nor a couple of months of suffering produce these happy results in real life. It is unfortunate but it is true that sinners do not reform themselves by memorizing the Ten Commandments. If they did Sunday schools would be full of saints and prison keepers would be looking for new jobs. But I am becoming almost as preachy as Mr. Porter Emerson Browne in my effort to muckrake his code of theatrical morals. For fear that this discourse may turn out a sermon I shall refrain from expounding my private ideas as to the manner in which the spendthrift wife might have been really and truly reformed. I shall not even give my ideas as to the sort of play which would reform a Columbia audience. Someone might write it ahead of me.

Maude Fay Sings in London

Miss Maude Fay of the well known Fay family of this city recently made her operatic debut at His Majesty's Theater in London in Richard Strauss' early effort "Feuersnot." The opera was sung before a London audience for the first time and did not make a deep impression, which is not surprising as London is slow to accept operatic novelties. Miss Fay sang Diemut, the principal female role and one of the London critics who expressed a mean opinion of the music paid her the compliment of saying that she made part of it attractive. "Feuersnot" is a one-act opera with a libretto by Ernst von Wolzogen and was first produced in Dresden nine years ago. Miss Fay sang the role on the Continent with success.

Rebuke to a "Good Fellow"

Lester Wallack's son in some recent reminiscences says that his father was a firm believer in the actor keeping himself aloof from the general public as much as possible when off the stage. He did not approve of his frequenting public places, such as hotel barrooms. He always contended that the actor cheapened himself by so doing. There was an actor connected with his company who was particularly noted for being what is generally termed "a good fellow." He was in the habit of frequenting a certain well-known saloon in New York, where he would sit by the hour telling funny stories to a large and admiring audience. Wallack called the actor's attention to this one day, telling him that while he in no way wished or desired to interfere with his personal liberty, or dictate his actions while off the stage, still he thought, as he was paying him a large salary for his services, it was not just that he should exploit his talents, except for the benefit of the theater. He also drew his attention to the fact that the public would not likely care to pay a dollar and a half to see him on the stage when they could see him exercise his talents for nothing at such and such a bar room. Of course, this was all said in a joking spirit, but none the less it had a salutary effect.

Leo Carillo in New York

When Leo Carillo came to San Francisco from San Luis Obispo and obtained a position in the art room of the Examiner he used to amuse his fellow artists as they bent over their drawing boards with imitations of animals. One day Ashton Stevens, the dramatic critic of the Examiner, happened into the art room when Carillo was performing and was so struck with the young artist's talent that he offered to speak to John Morrissey of the Orpheum in his behalf. The result was that Carillo went on the circuit and made a big hit. The latest report is that he has been successful in New York and at the present time he is the hit of the bill at one of the Brighton Beach vaudeville houses. Since leaving here Carillo has annexed a Chinese to his turn. This Chinese sits in the audience and when Carillo addresses him in Chinese he answers and the two maintain a spirited conversation to the astonishment of the audience. Finally Carillo calls the Chinese to the stage where he sings "Has Anybody Here Seen Kelly?" in pidgin English. This part of the act is described as "a scream."

Hackett's Fourth Week

"John Glayde's Honor," the play selected by James K. Hackett for his fourth week at the Alcazar, commencing next Monday night, was written by Alfred Sutro and scored a successful run in London before Mr. Hackett secured the exclusive right to utilize it in the United States. After producing it in his New York theater, where it attracted crowded audiences the greater part of a season, he presented it in several of the large Eastern cities. Also in the cast are Beatrice Beckley as Muriel Glayde, the wife; Catharine Calhoun as Dora Longman, Glayde's young niece, a charming ingenue role; Louise Brownell as Princess Castagnary, the American wife of a French noble; Arthur Hoops as Trevor Lerode, the lover of Muriel; Will R. Walling as Michael Shurmur, Glayde's secretary and sleuth; Bert Wesner as Christopher Branley; Charles Gunn as Howard Collingham, in love with Glayde's niece; Lucille Culver as Mrs. Rennick, a confidante of Muriel, and Marie Baker as Lerode's mother. The play calls for three elaborate stage sets.

"Seven Days" Coming

"The Spendthrift" continues for another week at the Columbia. The next attraction, commencing Monday, August 15, will be the comedy "Seven Days" which has been a leading success in New York since its opening early last season. The complications of the comedy are said to be extremely amusing. A party of New York's smart set meet for dinner and are quarantined for a week. They draw lots to see who shall attend to various needful household tasks. Their duties having been decided upon, the swells are set out to prepare meals and to other unaccustomed things, and their manner of doing them is wonderful to behold.

Opera at Idora Park

At Idora Park the Bevani Grand Opera Company will sing "Trovatore" for the last time tonight (Saturday). For next week, beginning with a matinee tomorrow, "Pagliacci" with the third act from "Lucia" will be the bill. The famous Navassars Ladies' Band has returned to Idora and will play their first Sunday concerts in the band shell tomorrow. They were very successful when they played at the Park last season.

At the Orpheum

Clay M. Greene and Harrison Armstrong are the authors of "The Police Inspector" which is to be performed next week at the Orpheum. The cast will include Scott Siggins, John T. Doyle, J. J. Williams, Fred A. Turner and Josephine Foy. Gus Sohlke's Bama Girls will appear in the musical frivolity, "Toy Shop Pastimes." Jimmie Lucas, comedian, and Josephine Fields, soubrette, are features of this act. Stepp, Mehlinger and King will present a singing and instrumental act. The trio comprises a vocalist, a banjoist and a pianist. Lou Anger, the German Soldier, who has just finished a successful engagement in "The Gay Hussars," will describe the trials of a soldier. Next week will be the last of Thomas J. Ryan and Mary Richfield, who will present another Cressy Skit called "Mag Haggerty, M. D.," Mr. and Mrs. Jack McGreevy, Granville and Rogers and the Four Fords.

"Such a Little Queen" at Ye Liberty

For the first time west of Chicago and the first time anywhere by a stock company, the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will present next Monday "Such a Little Queen," Channing Pollock's most recent comedy success. The play, although new to the coast, was one of the hits of the theatrical year in New York last season where it enjoyed a prosperous and lengthy run at the Hackett Theater with Elsie Ferguson in the leading role. In "Such a Little Queen" Mr. Pollock has taken for his leading characters two royal exiles—the king and queen respectively of two small European principalities, whom we find living amidst embarrassing pecuniary troubles in a Harlem flat. Although their marriage, for reasons of state, was to have been an early happening when they were monarchs, it is not until they meet in America as exiles that their romance really begins, and its development is productive of much humor. Miss Jewel and Mr. Ayres will both be suited to the leading roles. "Such a Little Queen" is to be given for one week only, after which Miss Jewel will be presented as "Sapho."

GUS SOHLKE'S "TOY SHOP PASTIMES"

With Jimmie Lucas and his dancing girls who will appear this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There is very little of interest to report as to the fundamental condition in the country in the recent week unless it be that the crop weather has been more favorable, generally speaking, for corn and wheat. The stock market received a final blow early in the week with forced liquidation from all quarters and the taking over of some large blocks of stock by bankers of an English syndicate. Since then the market has been rallied very sharply by manipulative tactics for the purpose of some distribution of speculative lines of securities. This we expect to continue for some time. Hence the drift of values will be to a lower level. Whatever the worst features are relative to crops, money and politics the coming Fall, we expect to see them thoroughly discounted market-wise.

Wheat—Speculators in wheat are in the main rather disposed to believe in higher prices before the end of the crop year, but they are very much in doubt regarding the immediate future. A factor of much immediate importance will be the early wheat marketings. Winter wheat has been slow to move on account of the late harvest and delaying rains, but the spring wheat harvest was hastened by the drought. Prospects therefore are that the after-harvest rush from both crops will come at once. This will make the movement of new wheat deceptively large for a time. Nevertheless it is quite likely to have its effect on values while it lasts. If it should also hasten the buying of wheat by the millers it will be of vast benefit to wheat values later in the crop year provided the general theory of a domestic basis for this year's crop is nearly correct, as now appears.

Corn—Corn started out last Monday with a burst of speed that was altogether too rapid to last. It was caused by the sizzling heat of the preceding forty-eight hours over the greater part of the country and the evidence that it had inflicted much damage in parts of Oklahoma and Kansas. Scattered rains and cooler weather over most of the corn area were reported to have caused losses, but other sections of the corn belt have shown fine progress.

Cotton—The cotton market last week was mostly a local affair but has been very firm and prices have shown a gradual upward tendency. Private estimates as to the condition of the growing crop made up to the twenty-fifth of July averaged seventy-five per cent and this was construed as rather bullish. A good many in the trade awaited the Government's figures which were issued August 2 and were not inclined to take a stand either way until this report was out of the way. Local showers fell quite generally last week in the southeastern states, the south Atlantic and east gulf states. There was no rain in Texas where the temperature was 100 to 108. Oklahoma was also without precipitation and temperatures ranged from 100 to 110. Our Liverpool friends advise us that Great Britain is inclined to think crop reports exaggerated but at the same time the opinion is expressed that 13 cents is cheap enough provided the crop is under 13,500,000 bales. Using this as a basis we feel justified in looking for a much higher price should the crop fall short of the 12½ mark as present crop advices would seem to indicate a crop of around 11½ millions. Curtailment will necessarily continue until supplies from the new crop are available and in the meantime prices are expected to show steady improvement.

Copper—The market for copper stocks has been rather quiet the past week and fluctuations have been unimportant except for an occasional flurry of a point or two in some of the specialties. Sales for the month of July were larger than reported in any month since the first of the year. It is stated in the trade that the leading agency sold between 50 and 60 million pounds. One large domestic concern purchased 5,000 tons equal to 11,200,000 pounds for shipment west. Most of the copper was sold at 12½ to 12¾. A report of a large producing concern said this week that the next big buying movement in copper would probably be on a basis of 13 cents per pound.

Sunday School "Howlers"

A recent set of Sunday school examination papers contained the following interesting explanations of the words "jot," "mote," and "hypocrites":

"Not a jot would pass away; the same as a skittle."

"A mote is the article the Jews wore next their skin."

"There is a lady in our street who kills herself to get to church Sunday morning and evening, but on Monday (washing-day) she is out at the back calling church to her neighbors for all she is worth. This is proper hypocrisy."

The Golden Rule was not always understood, and where understood was not always approved:

"The Golden Rule means, if anybody puts a mote in his."

"This rule would make the world very good, but we would soon get tired of it. A little sorrow is good for us."

"This rule of life I think would not be very satisfactory, for if a man struck you and killed you, how could you obey this rule?"

"When a boy at school asks you for what is not yours, give it to him."

No scandal about John the Baptist was really meant by the statement:

"John the Baptist went into the wilderness, where he led a wild life."

A returning tourist tells the following:

The Honorable Irene Lawley, daughter of Lord Wenlock, gentleman in waiting to the King (the daughter of a baron takes that prefix in merry England), sat next to a young American at a dinner party last winter in St. Moritz.

"Let me see," said Miss Lawley, "you have honorables in the States, don't you, Mr. Blank?"

"Yes, Miss Lawley."

"How weird! Tell me, how do they get the title?"

"Not by inheritance, Miss Lawley."

dition? And would it not be cruelty to abandon this blind man, to deprive him of her loving care, through fear of the world's malignant tongue? Of course, she would be very fortunate to become his wife; yet she felt, in her own conscience, that she was worthy of it, because she loved him. Indeed, she felt that the greater share of her happiness would be in the right to love him openly, to be able to proclaim herself his, wholly and forever his, to be able to consecrate herself, body and soul, to him alone. He could not see himself; he could see nothing relating to himself, excepting his own misfortune; yet how handsome he was, how handsome! and as delicate as a girl; and, as she sat looking at him, worshipping him, without his knowing it, she could say to herself: "You are mine, wholly mine, because you cannot see yourself, or know yourself; because your soul is held captive by your calamity, and has need of me, to see and to feel for you." But should she not, before yielding to his suit, have confessed to him that she was far from being what he imagined her to be? Was it not deceitful of her to remain silent? Yes, it was deceitful. Yet, after all, he was blind, and accordingly his needs would be satisfied by an ardent and devoted heart, such as hers, and by the illusion of beauty. And at least she was far from homely. Besides a beautiful, a really beautiful woman, might take advantage of his calamity to deceive him far more cruelly. His real need was not so much a beautiful face which he could never see, as a heart that would love him.

After several days of anguished indecision, the engagement was announced. They were to be married quite informally, immediately after the expiration of the sixth month of mourning for his mother.

Accordingly, Lydia had before her about a month and a half in which to prepare as best she could for the event. They were days of intense happiness; the hours winged their way amid tender, eager cares for his home comfort, and caresses from which she escaped with gentle violence, proudly guarding herself, until the day of the wedding, against the dangerous freedom of daily intimacy.

The wedding day was little more than a week off, when the unexpected announcement was brought to Lydia that Dr. Junio Falci had called to see her. Acting from impulse, she gave the order:

"Say that I am not at home!"

But the blind man, who had heard her low-spoken words, asked:

"Who is it?"

"Dr. Falci," the servant announced again.

"Don't you know?" said Lydia; "the doctor whom your poor mother summoned, just a few days before we lost her?"

"Oh, yes!" exclaimed Borghi, recollecting. "He examined me a long time, I remember, a very long time, and said that he would come again to—"

"Wait," interrupted Lydia suddenly, in great agitation, "I shall go and see him."

Dr. Falci remained standing in the middle of the parlor, his big, bald head hanging limply forward, his eyes half closed, and with one hand absently plucking at the short, stubby beard upon his chin.

"Be seated, doctor," said Lydia, entering before he was aware of her presence.

Falci roused himself, bowed and hastened to say:

"I beg your pardon, if—"

But in her excitement and perturbation, she strove to anticipate him:

"To tell you the truth, the reason that we had not sent for you—"

"Perhaps this visit is as ill-timed as my previous one," returned Falci, a slightly sarcastic smile hovering about his lips, "but you will forgive me, my dear young lady."

"Of course, what for? On the contrary—" began Lydia, coloring vividly.

"You do not know," resumed Falci, "how keen an interest we poor men of science feel in certain curious cases. Yet I am going to be quite frank with you and confess that I had forgotten all about the Marchese Borghi, notwithstanding the fact that his case struck me as exceedingly rare and strange. Yesterday, however, while gossiping at random with some friends, I was told of his approaching marriage with you. Am I correct?"

Lydia turned pale, but proudly bowed her head in confirmation.

"Permit me to offer my congratulations," returned Falci. "But as I was saying, I suddenly recollected. I recalled the diagnosis of glaucoma, in which, if I am not mistaken, so many of my illustrious colleagues agreed: a diagnosis easily explicable in the early stages, I assure you. Yet, I am convinced that if the marchesa had caused her son to be re-examined by my colleagues at the time when I first saw him, they would also have come to the conclusion that it was no longer a question of a genuine case of glaucoma. But no matter. I also recollected my second most inopportune visit, and I decided that in all probability between the confusion caused by the marchesa's sudden death, and the subsequent joy of your approaching marriage, you had quite forgotten me—now hadn't you—quite forgotten me—?"

"No!" Lydia interrupted him at this point, with curt denial, rebelling against his long-drawn explanation, that tortured her like slow poison.

"You had not forgotten?"

"No!" she repeated, with rude frankness, "but what I remembered best was the slight faith, not to say none at all, which—forgive my saying so—the marchesa had, even after your visit, in her son's recovery."

"But I did not tell the marchesa," Falci promptly rejoined, "that in my opinion, her son's eyes—"

"No, you didn't; you said it to me," Lydia broke in again. "But I also, like the marchesa, have—"

"Slight faith, not to say none at all, is that the idea? Well, it doesn't matter," Falci interrupted in his turn. "But meanwhile you did not inform the marchese of my visit or the reason for it."

"At the time, no."

"And later?"

"No, nor later, because—"

Dr. Falci raised his hand:

"I understand; love's young dream. But my dear young lady, pardon me. I know the saying goes that love is blind; but do you really wish the love of the marchese to be blind to such a degree as this? blind even physically?"

Lydia realized that the proud disdain, with which she strove to defend her dignity against an odious suspicion, was impotent against this man's cold, incisive assurance. Nevertheless she still struggled for self-possession, and asked him, with outward calmness:

"You will adhere to your belief that, with your assistance the marchese may regain his sight?"

"Not so fast, young lady," rejoined Falci, once more raising his hand. "Unlike God Almighty, I am not omnipotent. I have made only one examination of the marchese's eyes and then it seemed to me absolutely necessary to exclude all question of glaucoma. The position is just this: if, as I believe, you have the best interests of your betrothed at heart, the fact that there is still a doubt, still a hope, ought, it seems to me, to satisfy you."

"And if this doubt," Lydia hastened to rejoin, "after a second examination, should no longer remain; if this hope should, after all, come to nothing? Is it not cruel, as well as useless, to rouse him from his present resignation?"

"By no means," answered Falci, with blunt assurance. "On the contrary, it is a case where I felt it my solemn duty as a physician to come without a summons. All the more because, to be frank, I fear that I have to deal not merely with a case of disease, but also with a much more serious case of conscience."

"You suspect—" Lydia tried to interrupt him, but Falci gave her no chance to continue.

"You yourself," he went on, "told me just now that you had not let the marchese know of my other visit; and you gave a reason which I cannot accept, although not because it offends me, for if it is a question of faith or mistrust regarding me, that is for the marchese to decide and not for you. See here, my dear young lady, it is a matter of personal pride, I admit; but I pledge you my word to accept no pay from the marchese, provided he will come to my clinic, where he shall have every care and aid that science can give. On the strength of this promise, is it too much to ask, that you will announce me to the marchese?"

Lydia rose to her feet.

"Wait," said Falci, rising in his turn, and resuming his habitual manner. "I wish to assure you that I shall not tell the marchese of my earlier visit. I shall even say, if you prefer, that it was you whose anxiety impelled you to send for me, before the wedding."

Lydia looked him proudly in the eyes.

"You will tell him the truth. Or rather, I shall tell him," she said.

"That you did not trust me?"

"Precisely."

Falci shrugged his shoulders and smiled: "That might be to your disadvantage, and I should not wish that. If you would rather put off the examination until after the wedding, why, see here, I shall still be quite at your disposal, even then."

"No," Lydia told him, by gesture rather than voice, suffocated as she was with emotion, her face crimson with the shame caused by the doctor's manifest generosity; and with a wave of her hand she signed for him to come with her.

Silvio Borghi was waiting impatiently in his own room.

"Here is Dr. Falci, Silvio," said Lydia, as she entered, visibly excited. "We have just been clearing up a misunderstanding. You remember that the first time the doctor was here, he said that he would come again, don't you?"

"Yes," answered Borghi, "I remember very well indeed, doctor!"

"But you didn't know," continued Lydia, "that he came again, on the very morning that your mother died. He had a talk with me and said it was his impression that your trouble was not really what so many other doctors had declared it to be, and for that reason it was not, in his opinion, at all improbable that you might be cured. And I told you nothing about it."

"That, if you please," hastily interrupted Dr. Falci, "was because at the time I had done no more than express a doubt, in very vague terms; and the young lady regarded it merely as an attempt to offer consolation, and so attached but little weight to it."

"That is what I said, but not what you believe," replied Lydia, promptly and proudly. "Silvio, Dr. Falci suspected what was quite true, that I had concealed his second visit from you, and so he decided to come again, of his own accord, to offer you his services, free of charge. And now, Silvio, you may believe, as he does, that I was trying to keep you blind, so that you would be willing to marry me."

"Lydia, what do you mean?" exclaimed the blind man, starting violently.

"I mean just that," she insisted, with an unnatural laugh, "and it may well be true, because your blindness is the only condition on which I could become your wife!"

"What do you mean?" Borghi repeated, breaking in upon her excitedly.

"You will understand, Silvio, if Dr. Falci succeeds in restoring your sight. Good-bye."

"Lydia! Lydia!" Borghi called after her. But she had already left them, closing the door violently behind her. She went to her own room and flung herself upon her bed, biting the pillow in her passion of grief, and giving away to unrestrained weeping. When the first violence of her emotion had spent itself, she was left with a sense of amazement, almost of horror, as she listened to the accusations of her own conscience. It seemed to her that every word the physician had uttered, in his cold, incisive tone, she had long since said to herself, or rather, another personality within her had spoken thus; and she had pretended not to hear. Never for a moment had she forgotten about Dr. Falci, never; and every little while, his image had presented itself before her like the phantom of remorse, and she had thrust it aside with the insulting epithet, "Charlatan!" And her only reason—what was the use of denying it, any longer?—her only reason was that she desired, she really desired that Silvio should remain blind. His blindness was the one indispensable condition of his love. If tomorrow he should recover his sight, why should he, with his good looks, his youth, his wealth, his title, think of marrying her? Out of gratitude or pity? Surely for nothing else! Well, that she could not, and would not accept, even if he wished it; how could she, loving him as she did and wanting him only because she loved him? how could she, when his affliction was the very source of her love, her one defence against the malice of the world? Yet how strange it was that one could compromise with one's conscience to the point of committing a crime, to the point of founding one's own happiness upon the misfortune of another? She had been quite honest in her disbelief that her enemy, the doctor, could perform the miracle of restoring sight to Silvio—she disbelieved it, even now. Yet why had she concealed his visit? Was it really because she had not trusted the doctor, or was it not rather because the possibility suggested by the doctor, which offered such radiant hope to Silvio, meant to her, on the contrary, death, the death of love. What if the doctor should prove to be right? And even if she convinced herself that her love was enough to compensate the blind man for his lost sight—convinced herself that if, by some miracle, he should be cured, neither this great blessing, nor all the joys purchasable with his wealth, nor the love of any other woman could compensate him for the loss of her love? All these were arguments on her behalf, not on his. If she should go to him and say: "Silvio, you must choose between the blessing of restored sight and my love," he would surely rejoin, "And why do you wish to keep me blind?" Why? Because only this way, only at the cost of his affliction was happiness possible for her.

She sprang to her feet, as if in answer to a sudden summons. Was the examination still going on? What had the doctor said? What had he thought? She felt tempted to go on tip-toe, to listen behind the door which she herself had closed, but resisted the temptation. Here she was, outside the door, she herself, with her own hands had closed it forever. Could she bring herself to accept that man's insidious proposition? He had gone so far as to offer to put off the examination until after the wedding. What if she had accepted? No! No! She recoiled, with a shudder of repulsion. What an infamous bargain that would have been! The basest of treachery! And what would come of it? Contempt, not love.

She heard the door open; with a start, she hurried instinctively into the hall through which Falci must pass.

"I have undone the harm of your amazing frankness," he told her, stiffly, "and I have confirmed my first diagnosis. The marchese is to come to my clinic tomorrow. And now go to him, for he is expecting you. Good morning."

She remained there, crushed, almost dazed, her eyes following him down the hall, to the doorway; then Silvio's voice reached her, from the other room. She felt profoundly shaken, and suddenly turned giddy, almost falling as she hurried to him, her hands pressed to her face, as if to force back the tears.

He sat there, waiting for her with open arms. He clasped her to him, closer, while he poured forth his happiness in short, broken phrases, telling her that it was for her, only for her, that he longed to get back his sight; only for her, his darling, his beautiful, his precious wife!

"Are you crying? What for?" he asked suddenly. "And yet, do you know, I am crying too! It is from happiness! Oh, what joy, my Lydia, to think that I shall see you, see you, see you!"

Every word he uttered was a separate death to her. Even in his joy, the man felt presently that the source of her tears was somehow different from his; and straightway he began to tell her that really and truly he too would have doubted the doctor's words, on such a day as that had been! Well, then, why not forget it? What was the use of thinking any more about it? Today was a gala day! Away with troubles, away with all thoughts, excepting this one single thought: that his felicity was going to be complete, because he was going to see his wife! And now she would have more time, more leisure to prepare the room that was to be their future nest; and it was to be beautiful as a dream, that nest, for it was to be a part of the first scene his eyes would behold. Yes, he promised that he would come back from the hospital with the bandage still upon his eyes, and that he would open them there for the first time, in their own little nest.

"Talk to me! Talk to me! Don't let me do all the talking!"

"Are you tired?" she asked gently.

"No—but ask me again 'Are you tired?' with that voice of yours. Let me kiss it, here, on your lips, that voice of yours!"

"Yes."

"And now, talk to me; tell me all your preparations for this nest of ours."

"Tell you—?"

"Yes; I have asked no questions until now. And yet, no, I must not know anything about it, not even now. You shall do it all. I wish to be astonished, dazzled! But I shall see nothing of it, at first; I shall see only you! only you!"

With a brave effort, she choked down her desperate sobs, and forced an eager gladness into her face; and there, kneeling before him, with his form bent above her and his arms around her, she began to tell him of her love, with her lips almost touching his ear, and that voice of hers softer and more bewitching than ever before. But when, intoxicated by her presence, he drew her closer and threatened never to release her, she broke loose, drawing herself up proudly, in the consciousness of self-conquest. Even now, she might have bound him indissolubly to her. But no, she would not, because she loved him.

All that day, and far into the night, she intoxicated him with the music of her voice, sure of herself because he was still in darkness—in darkness, through which already pierced the rays of hope, as fair as the image that he had conjured up of her.

The following morning, she insisted upon accompanying him in the carriage as far as the clinic; and as she said good-bye, she told him that now she would set to work, at once, upon their future nest, like a busy little swallow.

"You shall see!" she said gayly.

She waited two days, terrible suspense, to hear the result of the operation. When she learned that it had succeeded, she waited a short time longer, in the lonely house. She prepared it for his return, with loving care; and when in his exultation he insisted that she should come to him, if only for an instant, she sent word that he must be patient for a few days longer; she could not come, for fear of exciting him; the doctor would not allow it.

She gathered together her few possessions, and, the day before he was to leave the hospital, she slipped away unperceived, to remain henceforth only as a voice in his memory—a voice which he, now that he had come forth from darkness, would perhaps seek upon many pairs of lips, but ever in vain.

The Landlady—Can I help you to some more soup, Mr. Dumley?

Mr. Dumley—No, thanks.

The Landlady—Don't you refuse, Mr. Dumley, because it isn't considered good form to be helped twice to soup; we're not particular people here.

Mr. Dumley—Oh, etiquette has nothing to do with it, madame; it's the soup.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 4159, Department No. 10, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of KATHERINE HUGHES, an Incompetent Person.

William Pearl, guardian of the person and estate of Katherine Hughes, an incompetent person, having this day presented to this Court and filed herein his verified petition praying that he be authorized, empowered and directed to sell certain real property belonging to said incompetent, and described in said petition, and it appearing from said petition that it is necessary, and it will be beneficial to said incompetent that the said real property described in said petition be sold.

Now therefore it is hereby ordered, that the next of kin of said Katherine Hughes, said incompetent above named, and all persons interested in her estate appear before this Court on Tuesday, the 30th day of August, 1910, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day in the courtroom of this Court, Department No. 10, Probate thereof, in the Grant Building, on the Southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to then and there show cause, if any they have, or if any either of them have, why the said petition of said William Pearl should not be granted, and why an order should not be granted authorizing, empowering and directing said William Pearl, as guardian of the person and estate of said above named incompetent, to sell her interest in the real property, described in said petition, at private sale;

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published once a week for three successive weeks in Town Talk, a newspaper of general circulation, printed and published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Dated, this 1st day of August, 1910.

SUMMONS (Divorce)

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 28,873, Department No. 10.

ELSIE FREDERICA McGLYNN, sometimes called FREDERICA McGLYNN, Plaintiff, vs. CHARLES S. McGLYNN, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Charles S. McGlynn, Defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten (10) days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful neglect; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 2nd day of April, A. D. 1910.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Department No. 1, No. 22,257.

ELISABETH MILLS REID and OGDEN MILLS, Plaintiffs, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Elisabeth Mills Reid and Ogden Mills, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

First Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Bush Street with the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence easterly along said northerly line of Bush Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence northerly and at right angles to said northerly line of Bush Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence westerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course sixty-seven (67) feet and six (6) inches; running thence northerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course twenty-two (22) feet; running thence westerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course seventy (70) feet to the easterly line of Montgomery Street; and running thence southerly along said easterly line of Montgomery Street one hundred and fifty-nine (159) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement.

Second Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Bush Street, distant thereon one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches easterly from the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Bush Street with the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence easterly and along the said northerly line of Bush Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; running thence at right angles northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence at right angles westerly sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; and running thence at right angles southerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement; being a part of Fifty Vara Lot Number Two Hundred and Three (203).

Third Parcel—An undivided one-half of that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Laura Place, distant thereon one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly from the southerly line of Pine Street, and which point is also eighty-seven (87) feet and six (6) inches easterly from the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence southerly and along said easterly line of Laura Place and parallel with the easterly line of Montgomery Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches; running thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with the easterly line of Montgomery Street twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches to the easterly line of Laura Place and point of commencement; being part of Fifty Vara Lots Numbers Two Hundred and Two (202) and Two Hundred and Fifty-five (255); subject, however, to all the terms, conditions, covenants and agreements contained in that certain indenture made on the 11th day of December, 1906, by and between Exchange Realty Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of California, having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and D. O. Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid (wife of Whitelaw Reid), and recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 5th day of February, 1907, in Liber 64 of Deeds, at page 10, New Series.

Fourth Parcel—An undivided one-fourth of that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly on a perpendicular line drawn from a point on the southerly line of Pine Street one hundred and sixty-five (165) feet easterly from the easterly line of Montgomery Street, which point of commencement is also seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches easterly on a perpendicular line drawn from a point on the easterly line of Laura Place one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly from the southerly line of Pine Street; running thence southerly and parallel with Laura Place twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly and parallel with Pine Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with Laura Place twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly twenty-five (25) feet to the point of commencement; being part of Fifty Vara Lot Number Two Hundred and Two (202); subject, however, to all the terms, conditions, covenants and agreements contained in that certain indenture made on the 11th day of December, 1906, by and between Exchange Realty Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of California, having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and D. O. Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid (wife of Whitelaw Reid), and recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 5th day of February, 1907, in Liber 56 of Deeds, at page 371, New Series.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute; that their title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens or any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein and have such other relief as may be met in the premises.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Department No. 2, No. 22,256.

OGDEN MILLS as Executor of the Will of DARIUS OGDEN MILLS, Deceased, Plaintiff, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ogden Mills as Executor of the Will of Darius Ogden Mills, deceased, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

First Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred (100) feet southerly from the southeasterly corner of Golden Gate Avenue (formerly Tyler Street) and Octavia Street, and running thence southerly along the said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly one hundred (100) feet to the easterly line of Octavia Street and to the point of commencement; being a portion of Fifty Vara Lot Number Four (4) in Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152) of the Western Addition of said City and County of San Francisco.

Second Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet southerly from the southerly corner of Golden Gate Avenue (formerly Tyler Street) and Octavia Street, and running thence southerly along the said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly one hundred (100) feet to the easterly line of Octavia Street and to the point of commencement; being a portion of Fifty Vara Lot Number Four (4) in Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152) of the Western Addition of said City and County of San Francisco.

Third Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred and fifty (150) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Golden Gate Avenue with the easterly line of Octavia Street; running thence southerly along said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at right angles easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at right angles westerly one hundred (100) feet to the said easterly line of Octavia Street and point of commencement; being a portion of Western Addition Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that Ogden Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute and that their title to said property be established and quieted, subject only to the possession of plaintiff for the purposes of administration; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens or any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be met in the premises.

Auto Notes

he Premier number 1 which won this year's den tour through one of the most remarkable runs ever recorded in this country used Stromberg Carburetors. A telegram from the Pioneer Motor Mfg. Co. has just been forwarded to I. D. McCoy, manager of the local branch of Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co. It reads: "We congratulate you upon the excellent show made by Stromberg Carburetors on Premier 1, winner of 1910 Glidden Tour. No attention or adjustment required during the long and long contest."

S. Howard, president of the Howard Automobile Co. who has been visiting various Lake Sonoma counties summer resorts is back town for a few days but will return to his family whom he left at McCrays near Clover. Howard reports that increasing numbers of guests have been coming to the summer resorts during the latter part of the month. A noticeable feature this season is the increased demand at all the resorts for auto housing room. Only Nichols, president of the Weinstock Automobiles Company and one of the most popular men in the local automobile business, is touring the East in company with A. I. Philp, vice-president of the Morgan & Wright Rubber Company. All the large cities of importance are to be visited and the automobile and automobile situation studied extensively. Nichols, who has been gone about a month now, is not expected to return for at least another.

The automobile industry probably more than any other is solving the problem of adequate housing for employees. Club and dining rooms are being installed in practically all the larger motor factories for the sole accommodation of the workmen. The Oakland Motor Company of Detroit, Michigan, recently installed a cafe in connection with their plant. From 150 to 200 employees partake of the noon day meal and they take all three at the cafe.

According to advices received by Calvin C. from J. L. Meredith of Mason City, Iowa, Meredith has just succeeded in driving his Hudson roadster up a 45 degree grade that has baffled ambitious autoists in this section of country. In the letter he said that the achievement of the car which was accomplished bravely without mishap of any kind had attracted attention for miles around, this Hudson being the first and only car to make the climb.

H. Shields, sales manager of the H. E. Wilcox Motor Car Co. of Minneapolis, manufacturers of the Wilcox truck, has just left for Portland, Oregon, after having paid a three weeks' visit to the Pioneer Automobile Company, local Wilcox distributors. Mr. Shields, who was previous to coming to San Francisco, had spent some time in Los Angeles, where he closed with one of the largest automobile firms in the south metropolis for the Wilcox trucks business. He impresses himself as particularly well impressed in the future promise that this State holds out for the motor truck trade. Although he finds that

Los Angeles has to date more fully realized truck possibilities he is of the opinion that San Francisco hills will eventually make this city the user of motor driven commercial vehicles. Paul L. McMullen who is touring Lake County this Thomas "6-70" has just astonished the inhabitants of that corner of the world by setting a new record for the run from Lakeport to Bart Springs. This distance which includes a particularly severe sixteen mile grade was made in one hour and thirty-five minutes. The machine carried seven passengers, nine suit cases and one trunk.

The Ames, Harris, Neville Co. who keep a stock for the use of their salesmen have just received the car equipped with Morgan & Wright safety Tread tires.

Norman De Vaux, manager of the Northwest Truck Company, has just passed through San Francisco on his return to Portland from Flint, Michigan, where he has been spending a few weeks at the Buick factory. The Northwest Truck Co. is one of the many Buick distributors who have found their 1910 allotment inadequate for supplying demand. Consequently Mr. De Vaux has been arranging for an increased number of cars for the coming season.

The Haynes factory has the reputation of having the most efficient painting department in the United States. This adds very materially to the elegance of the Haynes cars beside giving the original paint in which they come a lasting quality not often found. The various attractive coats in which these machines are appearing have been a source of wide comment in local auto circles. At present a Napier Green car is being shown on the Haynes Auto Sales Co's floor and is attracting much attention. It is one of the newest machines that ever came to town.

The Los Angeles-San Diego run is undoubtedly the most popular in Southern California for automobile speed tests. The record for this course is one of the most sought for distinctions by drivers who glory in fast going. Harold Stone in a Great Western has just lowered the former mark of 10:21 to 9:58. The machine when making the run was wearing Diamond tires. These same tires will soon have achieved a privileged place in the automobile hall of fame. Previous to this last distinguished service they had already won the Coalinga road race and to date have done 9,000 miles. In spite of this hard usage they appear but little the worse for wear.

A trip but recently completed in the mountainous district of western North California by H. D. Honeycutt of Concord with a Hupmobile is the chief topic of conversation among the motor car enthusiasts of that section of the country. According to advices just received by S. G. Chapman this trip was made over roads many of which had previously been considered impossible for automobiles. The star performance was the climbing of a peak known as Blowing Rock which reaches an altitude of 4,500 feet. The only available road is exceedingly steep and has baffled repeated efforts of gasoline cars of every known power to climb it. The Hupmobile however topped the peak. The only other car that every reached the summit was a steamer.

A. J. Smith, the local Elmore distributor, is a strong advocate of Hartford tire efficiency. He bases his conclusions not only on his own personal experience but also upon the experience of Elmore customers. He has delivered seventy cars this season equipped with Hartfords. Five of these were sold to stage companies doing heavy mountain work and out of the whole number not one complaint of tire trouble has been given.

Arthur—When she hit him with the golf ball did it knock him senseless?

Natalie—I guess so. I understand they are soon to marry.

Was He a Vegetarian?

"If you marry Grace," exclaimed an irate father to his son, "I'll cut you off without a penny, and you won't have so much as a piece of pork to boil in the pot."

"Well," said the young man, "Grace before meat," and he immediately went in search of a clergyman.

A Job-Chaser at His Best

The thing most to be regretted about political strife is its tendency to make demons of men. We are bad enough at best; but when in the heat and dust of political contest men become thorough-paced sticklers for their passions and prejudices all the finer sentiments of human nature are extinguished. In their fury they attack their opponents tooth and nail, might and main, without scruple, without any regard to truth or justice, without remorse, without the faintest sense of the ugliness and enormity of their blind and implacable hatred. It never occurs to these impassioned partisans that men who do not think as they do have inherent dispositions common to the species; they insist that all who are not of their political faith must be hated and proscribed as though they belonged to another race of beings. This species of bigotry and intemperance when it is indulged in the warmth of one's espousal of an abstract idea or in passionate support of principle is detestable, but when it is the offspring of a selfish interest it is contemptible. The followers of a candidate for office who become uncharitable in their partisanship may be excusable on the theory that they have been carried away by their loyalty, but what can be said in defense of the candidate who goes about overflowing with gall and bitterness, resenting opposition to his interests with abuse and vilification, flaming with denunciation, serving up sliced and carbonadoed, a delicious morsel for the mob, everybody who attempts to dissuade the people from giving him honor, glory and a fat salary? Is the man who thus betrays the instincts and traits of the wild beast deserving of our confidence and esteem? Or should we regard him with contempt and detestation? A type of this class of arrogant politicians is running for Governor in this campaign. We allude to the Hon. Hiram Johnson, who entertained a mob in Los Angeles the other night with a tirade against an old man, who probably like the most of us has many sins to answer for, but who has done a few things that ought to entitle him, if not to respect and veneration, at least to immunity from the billingsgate of a job-chaser. General Harrison Gray Otis, the man vituperated by the splenetic standard-bearer of our elegant and high-toned reformers, vindicated his patriotism on the battlefields of his country long before the Hon. Hiram Johnson was dry behind the ears. And many years later when he had much to live for, when the luxuries of life were his to command, when he was surfeited with glory, and none but the noblest motives could have inspired the proffering of his services to his country, he again took up arms, crossed the seas to tropic climes and played the soldier's hard and hazardous part. At this time the Hon. Hiram Johnson was doing pot-house politics in Sacramento, and nothing was farther from his thoughts than the prospect of hazarding his hide on the altar of patriotism which he is now adorning with his dynamic personality. This is the patriot who erupted his invectives against General Otis in true Johnsonian fashion, thus: "The one blot upon the fame of Southern California, and the bar sinister on the escutcheon of Los Angeles is Harrison Grey Otis, a creature who is vile, infamous, degraded and putrescent. Here he sits in senile dementia, with gangrened heart and rotting brain, grimacing at every reform and chattering in impotent rage against decency and morality, while he is going down to his grave in snarling infamy." Charming language that, from the innermost soul of "decency and morality." Honored will California be with the author of those fine sentiments in the gubernatorial chair.

A Specimen of Partisan Fanaticism

For an illustration of the ridiculous extreme to which frenzied and impassioned partisanship is capable of going let us glance at an editorial in the Call of Saturday last on the subject of the scandal sprung in Washington by Senator Gore of Oklahoma. This gentleman being an insurgent is among the anointed who enjoy the inestimable advantage of having their utterances accepted with something of the reverence that is inspired by holy writ. But Senator Gore appears to have overrated his prerogative. At all events he was somewhat indiscreet in his uncharitable haste to place the brand of infamy on the brow of men in high station. It would be hard under the principles of ethics that obtained in polite and civilized society the world over before the Roosevelt era to find justification for Senator Gore's reflections on Vice-President Sherman and others. Those reflections were made on the authority of a man, who, according to Senator Gore's testimony, had offered him a bribe, and who, it is but reasonable to suppose if the Senator is to be believed, was desirous of giving him the impression that he would be in good and reputable company if he consented to sell his vote. How remarkable that the Senator who is an experienced politician and therefore presumably acquainted with the commonplace time-worn trick by which bribery is facilitated should have given credence to such testimony! How still more remarkable that he should have had the courage, not to say the indecency, to give it publicity! Having since learned that Vice-President Sherman was on his side in the matter of the contracts for the sale of Indian land, and thus becoming aware that the mean and cruel imputation to which he had gratuitously given currency was unfounded, he now asks that it be forgotten, at the same time informing us that he had never believed that Mr. Sherman was interested in the Indian contracts and that it was with the greatest reluctance that he had mentioned the Vice-President's name. Which plea in extenuation, in our opinion, is worse than none at all. If Senator Gore believed Mr. Sherman innocent, all the more reason for his not tarnishing that gentleman's reputation with the breath of scandal either with or without reluctance. We feel sorry for Senator Gore. Every man equipped with a conscience is to be pitied who does another a great wrong. And he is especially to be pitied if, occupying a high station, he betrays to the world coarse and brutal instincts. But these moral reflections are not to our purpose. We have discussed Senator Gore's conduct that it might be easier to appreciate the Call's indifference to facts and circumstances when the opportunity arose to smash one of the hated regulars. Unlike Senator Gore the editor of the Call cannot plead that he propagated calumny with reluctance. He cannot even truthfully affirm that he failed to perceive the worthlessness of Senator Gore's testimony, its hearsay character, its inherent viciousness in view of the source of the Senator's information. For he says that it is inconclusive "because it rests only on the word of one J. L. Hamon, an Oklahoma politician." Nevertheless he grasped with avidity and enthusiasm the opportunity to participate in the assassination of Vice-President Sherman's character. In furtherance of this enterprise he insists that a question of veracity between Gore and Hamon should be resolved in favor of the former, though what there has been in Gore's conduct to commend him to credence or respect he does not tell us. Thus is the public mind inoculated with a slow venom: "The Call would much regret to see Vice-President Sherman involved in any such scandal," but "the accusation is one that cannot be ignored." In the next breath he alludes to the testimony as "proof." Awkward malignity! how poorly thou dost ape philosophic impartiality! Why cannot the accusation be ignored? The reason is irresistible. It is because "The Vice-President is unfortunate in his political associations." Abandoned wretch! He doesn't associate with insurgents. Therefore he is a whited sepulchre. Therefore the presumption is against him. Give ear to our impeccable moralist and flawless logician: "He (Sherman) is affiliated in politics with men like Aldrich and Littauer. It is an unfortunate association, and while we do not doubt that Mr. Sherman will be able to clear himself, the necessity for a full inquiry is indicated, and it is to Mr. Sherman's interest that this course shall be pursued." Here we have partizan fanaticism carried to the nth. degree. The argument is clear and concise: when a man is not with you the presumption is against him whenever he is charged with crime: when a man is with you, the burden of proof is on the other fellow.

The Seat of Constructive Statesmanship

The news from Kansas, Nebraska and South Dakota has kindled prophetic enthusiasm in the insurgent mind. "Battle Bob," the boisterous Bristow, the mettlesome Murdock and all the rest of the cantankerous regenerators have broken forth in hymns of joy and thanksgiving on the triumph of muckocracy in the hotbeds of hysteria, which they would have us believe is the undeniable precursor of the Millennium. Not hitherto have Kansas, Nebraska and South Dakota been regarded as the pivotal States of the Union. Indeed, until the recent primaries, nobody ever thought of looking to any of these States for inspiration, nobody ever dreamt that in all three of them simultaneously would develop the unmistakable symptoms of the spiritual awakening of the nation. Rather to the contrary of anything akin to the present conception of the significance of the news from "Bleeding" Kansas and her siser commonwealths was the notion that formerly prevailed regarding the inference that should be drawn from anything they might do. It was generally supposed that to these States had gravitated most of the half-baked philosophers of the world and that the various communities consisted of their disciples. This impression was due to the remarkable fertility of these States inisms and osophies and to the many eccentricities of behaviour by which they have contributed either to the gaiety or sadness of the rest of the country, with which they always have been at issue. Nobody has ever been able to expound the political metaphysics of the leaders of thought in Kansas or Nebraska. Men who have given some study to the temperament of the people of those States have not been able to throw much light on the subject. They only know that what doesn't quadrature with the curious theories that are propagated among them, and that in proportion as they are novel are accepted as the products of superior genius, is pronounced anathema. What may justify us now in suddenly turning to these people for light and inspiration, we have not been able to ascertain, but we surmise that it is because they have embraced insurgency. By the same token perhaps we may be able to do away with our insane asylums.

The Insurgent Propaganda

Notwithstanding the news from Kansas, Nebraska and South Dakota we are of the opinion that the insurgents have good reason to be sanguine and elated over their prospects. For while we are aware that it is a fixed habit with Kansas, Nebraska and South Dakota to be at issue with the rest of the country, we are also conscious of the susceptibilities of the masses and sensible of the potency of the subtle appeals that have been made to their passions and prejudices. Furthermore we are under no delusion respecting public opinion. We draw no fine distinction between public opinion and public clamor. The people are deluded through sophistries and falsehoods as well as through their emotions. The automata of passion, the Heliogabali of excess, from time immemorial they have been the victims of deception, the playthings of charlatantry. For them to ascertain just what their interests are it has frequently become necessary for experience to teach them that their affections have been trifled with. Now the people of this country have not yet experienced the insurgents in power. These wonderful reformers whose self-approbation has to themselves the appearance of a public judgment in their own favor; these Chautauqua magicians who are eager to put the government into their cauldron and with poisonous weeds and wild incantations regenerate and renovate the enfeebled body politic, are yet to be indulged to the limit of their incapacity. But they have certainly made considerable progress toward the conquest of the public mind. What precisely is the state of that mind we have yet to ascertain. What the state of that section of it is that throbs in Kansas, Nebraska and South Dakota we knew long before the primaries. There the people have always believed that the country was going to the demnition bow-wows and that disaster could be averted by nothing short of an upheaval. No missionary work was required in those States. But the insurgent propaganda has been preparing the mind of the whole country for just such an upheaval as has been demanded by the calamity howlers of the mad belt. This is a thoroughly organized and richly dowered propaganda. Ostensibly hostile to the plutocracy, it is financed by the magnates of some of the most powerful of our corporations whose zeal for reform is far from inexplicable. With the expansion of our industrial interests has developed a keen rivalry among our financiers, and the battleground is the seat of government, the prize, control of the party in power. The leaders of insurgency, therefore, are nothing more than the puppets of one of the warring factions of our plutocracy; the muckraking journals are their subsidized handmaidens. A sordid quarrel, this that has set the country by the ears, but one that may have a tremendous influence on the destinies of the nation. For in making their conquest of the public mind and preparing it for insurgency the muckrakers have certainly created a widespread distrust of our institutions. Their one purpose has been to provoke dissatisfaction, impatience, unrest and a spirit of protest against everything and everybody, and undeniably their efforts have not been without success. It only remains to be seen whether the people while losing faith in their institutions have transferred it to such transparent mediocrities in the demagogic art as those vociferous statesmen who demand that of all men they alone be regarded as above suspicion.

Justice in the Crippen Case

With what jealousy the fundamental principles of Anglo-Saxon liberty are guarded under the monarchical institutions of England may be perceived through the medium of the Crippen case. The study of that case we earnestly commend to those ardent republicans who believe that the people when they have a hold on the reins of government can always be depended upon to safeguard their liberties. Earnestly also we commend the study of the case to those zealous champions of society who would reform the criminal code by adopting certain features of the British system of justice with a view to making it more difficult for a guilty man to escape. Some time ago we suggested to these gentlemen that while the features of the British system which they favor are excellent it would not be wise to adopt them unless certain other features were also adopted. The point that we sought to make was that while it is desirable to make it more difficult for a guilty man to escape it is most undesirable to make it easier for the State to convict one who is innocent. And this we maintained would be the result if we broadened the discretion of trial judges without removing those judges as far from public clamor and political influence as are the judges of England. And now that the Crippen case has come to our attention let us take cognizance of certain inviolable principles designed to safeguard the innocent which it serves to exemplify, and the violation of which is of daily occurrence in this country. On Dr. Crippen's arrival in Canada, a fugitive from England, he was allowed by law fifteen days' time in which to employ counsel and combat extradition proceedings. In this country it is not unusual for a man to be arrested in one State and kidnaped by the authorities from another. Innocent men have been frequently transported surreptitiously by the officers of the law from one State to another, and subjected to hardships and cruelties. Innocent men have been taken from the arms of their friends and thrown into the clutches of their enemies. Another illustration of the difference between the American and the British idea of justice was afforded by the conduct of the Scotland Yard detective in charge of the Crippen case. He had very little to say to the prisoners. Correspondents of American newspapers wanted to know when the prisoners were to be given the "third degree." And great was their astonishment when they were told that this species of medieval cruelty was prohibited by English law and never practiced by English policemen. The "third degree" among our police authorities is the most cherished of American institutions. And so effective is it for the purposes for which it is employed, whether the subject be innocent or guilty, that we cannot understand why anybody should think it necessary to facilitate the work of prosecuting officers.

Having failed in his attempt to asperse the character of the Vice-President Senator Gore is now making unkind remarks about the Choctaw Indians. Before long he may be reviving that scandal about Queen Elizabeth.

Giuseppe Cadenasso, His Art

By Hortense Russell

Let us speak for a moment or so of Giuseppe Cadenasso and the mysterious, elusive spirit of nature which his wizard brush transfers to canvas. No other artist has painted the eucalyptus with more delicacy or grace, and yet with so much truth. He has put on canvas these spectral trees whose ghostly leaves make silver shadows through the fog. He has made them sister to the misty air in which they thrive, and we leave his canvas with the feeling that he has given us the very essence of their wistful moods.

But Cadenasso does not always dwell in dampness. Though his fogs wet our faces and we yearn for the unattainable with the melancholy trees, he is too much the son of Italy to dwell long in cool grey places.

Born in Genoa, the city of great navigators, the home of Paganini of the magic violin and the birthplace of Nicolo Barabino, painter of "Colombo derided before the court of Salamanca," he has brought from his native city the Gift of Color. He attains glowing sunsets with the same facility as he achieves dull mists, and the same trees seen by the amber glow of the setting sun emit the last warm breath of dying day.

Cadenasso has struck a new note. Like Rosstand he has shown us the beauty of the commonplace.

"In the future," says Cadenasso, "art students from all over the world will come here to study the beauties which we have overlooked. The beauties around the growing San Francisco are like a dream of life which cannot be conceived, so hidden that to the untrained eye they pass unnoticed. The growing consciousness that we pass by many a landscape not unfit to paint is increasing the number of men who find inspiration in their own back yards."

Here, at home, Cadenasso has found subjects that would give a poet inspiration for eternal sonnets. In his "Summer," a study in blue and gold, we see the seared brown foothills of Leona Heights transformed to loveliness by a summer sunset. He makes of our own country an enchanted land. He forces us to recognize what, hundreds of times, we have looked at with unseeing eyes. The parched grass that in the glaring light of day clothes the hills in a garment of unsightly tan is transfigured by the last rays of the sun into a golden mantle. The hill in the foreground is touched with rosy gold that slowly pales as we climb up into the purple shadows of a leafy gorge. Here we linger awhile with that sense of infinite peace that we always long for when we read that line of Dante, "This way he goes who goes in quest of peace." We hesitate, not knowing whether or not to descend into the shelter of the dusky dell. One look at the sky forces a decision. Its violet blue, the same tone as the shadows in the trees, will shortly fade to grey, and the spangled indigo of a summer's night will overtake us. No! Better to watch the vapors rise from the scented earth, and go to our homes with the colors of that still evening clearly defined upon our retinas, that we may see it in our mind's eye through the gloomy winter.

This picture is full of the feeling of mystery, but not of sadness. It gives us the smiling face of nature, the beneficent goddess, and yet—the alluring gorge lies full of undiscovered secrets. It is a picture to live with, a companion in our loneliness, a poem of peace. Though the canvas measures only 40 by 60 inches, the masterful handling of tone gives one the feeling of space and of great distance. It is a simple subject treated simply. Atmosphere is portrayed, and nothing else.

Cadenasso is like Claud Monet; it is the spirit of the thing that he wishes to express. A photographer could give us the outline of the hills. In a woman who has charmed us it is the smile, the quaint gesture, a particular note in her voice, some fleeting trick of expression that is gone almost before we name it, that interprets her to us and makes her live in our memories long after she is gone. And so it is with nature. It is not by every rock, every leaf, every tiny blade of grass that she is familiar to us; but by that mysterious quality of spirit that make her the ever changing but eternal mother.

Though Cadenasso came here when he was but nine years old and through circumstances has never been able to travel, still he is essentially Italian, and like other artists from his native country, he goes to Dante for much of his inspiration.

In his Vision of Dante one feels that his treatment is even more weird than that of Gustave Dore. In each one feels man's subordination to nature. But in Dore's picture man has a chance to grow and overcome while Cadenasso's conception impresses one with a sense of fate. He makes us feel, by the small slinking figure of Dante faintly discernible in the gloom beside the lake, that man is but an atom groping weakly in a limitless expanse. The deep lake in the foreground mocks at him, the towering trees in the background o'ershadow him, the angry sky intimidates him with a foreboding of coming storm. In this picture the artist has caught the essence of medievalism, and we are taken with Dante into a realm of mystery of which he says:

"In the midway of this our mortal life,
I found me in a gloomy wood, astray."

The illustrative element of the picture is remarkable, yet the decorative and pictorial qualities, the intense feeling, the sombre yet rich coloring, will give it especial value as long as the mystery of nature continues to haunt the heart of man.

California is fortunate that Cadenasso's limited means have prevented him from studying abroad. Had he gone the same road as the rest of the art world we would have lost a painter of originality and genius. Never for a moment does Cadenasso cater to the popular taste. Though he has criticism to combat, like all originals, he continues to give of his best and by aiming high he has won for himself a permanent place in the world of art.

Correspondence

On the Contrary, It Is Quite Ordinary

To the Editor of Town Talk—Dear Sir: Last week the editor of the Call gave us an editorial in which he made fun of our library board for deciding that one of the Pansy books was not a good book for our children to read. He even said the board showed "erratic idiosyncrasy" which may not be as bad as it sounds. And yet in the very first sentence of his editorial the editor confessed that he knew nothing about the Pansy books. Now I would like to ask you, is not this a most extraordinary way for an editor to act—confessing his ignorance of a subject and then condemning those who know something about it?

Very sincerely,

—A Palo Altan.

An Academic Question

Editor Town Talk—Sir: What is your opinion about Mr. A. A. Moore's remark that he was practicing law when Judge Lawlor was "flapping a towel in the corner of a prize ring"? I have heard several discussions of the matter in this town. One gentleman who is regarded as quite an authority on ethical questions says that it is unjustifiable to sneer at a man on account of his past life only when he has shown that he has put whatever was discreditable behind him. He argues that if a man has improved his circumstances and won prestige without deserving it; that if he has attained a position which is in itself deserving of respect and through which he seeks to command a respect of which it is evident from his conduct he is unworthy, it may not be improper to inquire whether he has divorced himself from traits peculiar to his early calling. The gentleman who expresses these views is inclined to defend Mr. Moore. He declares that Judge Lawlor's behaviour was not above that of a hanger-on of a prize-ring camp when in answer to a polite request politely made by a reputable attorney he gave utterance to an insulting remark. What are your views in this connection?

Sacramento, August 7.

Yours truly,

—L. F. R.

A Fellow Feeling Between Cities

Editor Town Talk—Sir: I was a little surprised to find in the Call the other day an editorial calling attention to the fact that New Orleans "is not harmonious or united in the endeavor to secure the location of the Panama-Pacific exposition in that city." By way of proof the Call quotes the New Orleans Daily States which has been scoring its contemporaries for representing Louisiana as "a corrupt and ring-ridden State, in which the people are enslaved and morality is at a low ebb." The Daily States declares that such exposures at this time are not calculated to win the favor of Congress. It occurs to me that nevertheless San Francisco has no advantage over New Orleans in the matter of harmony on public questions. Newspaper roasts on San Francisco are almost of daily occurrence, and we are told by certain papers that are generously patronized by your damphool merchants that the State is ring-ridden and that to elevate its moral tone we must elect to the gubernatorial office a certain flamboyant individual who has gone out of his way to hurl insults at the President, who from all accounts is San Francisco's friend. If San Francisco regards the Fair as of premier importance may it not be advisable for her to decide to let well enough alone in preference to taking a kick at the President by bestowing honor on the only man who is capable of uplifting this glorious but machine-ridden State?

Oakland, August 6.

Very truly yours,

—Francis Bolger.

An Astounding Financial Scheme

Comprising Details of the Transcontinental Railroad Project of the Pearson Syndicate and Some Facts about the Personality and Career of the Soldier of Fortune Who Planned It

By Robert McTavish

It is only a short step from success to failure in big financial undertakings. Some of the gigantic enterprises successfully put through by the late Mr. Harriman just escaped being monumental failures. Because they had happy consummation their author was acclaimed a wizard of the money market. If they had turned out otherwise he would have been scoffed at. In the world of finance it is unquestionably logical to judge an undertaking by its outcome—to condemn it if it fails, to approve it if it succeeds. But nevertheless there is an amount of daring, mental capacity, of executive ability and sheer hard work expended on schemes which fail that should receive its meed of fame. Because the best laid plans slip a cog is no reason why the planner should be deprived of recognition. All hail, therefore, to Percival Farquhar, a financial genius who failed!

Percival Farquhar, of London, Paris, New York, Rio de Janeiro and other cities, was the brains and imagination of the defunct Pearson Syndicate. The Pearson Syndicate is a recent corpse and not until its obsequies had been performed less than two weeks ago by Kuhn, Loeb and Company did our financiers know that Percival Farquhar animated it. They have not yet recovered from the shock which Percival gave to their sluggish systems. Not that Farquhar was a wreck. Far from it. He had every respect for the properties to which he turned his attention. He wouldn't have hurt a hair of their heads, so to speak. He simply wanted to absorb enough of them to make a transcontinental railroad system from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If he had succeeded he would have been sublime; as it is he is a wonder.

Dr. F. S. Pearson was the nominal head of the Pearson Syndicate. Dr. Pearson, however, was a mere figurehead. He is an American engineer who stands very high in the estimation of British and Canadian financiers on account of his many successful deals in Spanish-American railroads and other corporations, operations which have made both Dr. Pearson and his financial friends in Britain and Canada very wealthy. Toward the end of last year the Pearson Syndicate began operations in this country by buying heavily of Rock Island securities. Their next move was to invest in the Lehigh Valley road. Now the Lehigh runs from New York to Buffalo and the Rock Island runs from Chicago to Denver. It may have been that Dr. Pearson and his associates, chief among whom was Percival Farquhar, first conceived the idea of bridging the gap between Buffalo and Chicago. In all likelihood it was Farquhar who conceived that idea. Certainly it was he who expanded that idea into an inspiration. The inspiration was nothing less than a transcontinental road from New York to San Francisco.

Pearson and Farquhar had been elected directors of Rock Island and it was in that capacity that they bought into Lehigh. But when they unfolded the ambitious project that had sprung from the brain of Farquhar the other directors of Rock Island gasped and turned it down. So the Pearson Syndicate went it alone in their other operations. First of all they bridged the gap between Buffalo and Chicago by buying an interest in Wabash. From Denver to the Pacific Coast is an immense stretch but the brains of the syndicate was not dismayed. The best available route was by the Denver and Rio Grande which owns two-thirds of the stock of the recently completed Western Pacific. But forty per cent of the stock of the Denver and Rio Grande is owned by the Missouri Pacific, so that in order to acquire substantial influence in Denver it was necessary to acquire substantial influence in Missouri Pacific.

It is not known just how far the investments directed by Percival Farquhar proceeded, but his plan, embracing as it did stock of the Lehigh, Wabash, Rock Island, Missouri Pacific, Denver and Rio Grande and Western Pacific, represented a mileage of 19,377 and capital stock to the value of $484,000,000. The exact amount of cold cash invested will probably never be known, but authoritative estimates place it in the neighborhood of $50,000,000. Seemingly the syndicate holdings were amply protected in the early part of the year. Stocks and bonds were pledged on loans made by New York and London bankers but the margins on these loans were sufficiently wide to provide for any but abnormal and extraordinary fluctuations in the security markets. Unfortunately extraordinary depression of the security market was just what took place and the bankers began calling for additional collateral. The syndicate could only meet the demand by cutting down its holdings. The market was a bad one for unloading and liquidation was accomplished only at great sacrifices. The calls of the bankers persisted and members of the syndicate evinced an unwillingness to stand the gaff, so the syndicate collapsed. When the smoke of the battle cleared away, Kuhn, Loeb and Company and its London connections had so many railroad securities that they hardly knew what to do with them and the Pearson Syndicate was a corpse.

The syndicate had held about 950,000 shares of railroad stock representing cash payments of about $50,000,000. But the figures only hint at the magnitude and audacity of the undertaking. In the course of the development of the scheme the adventurers must perforce have encountered every big group of financiers and most of the powerful railroad systems in the United States. In securing control of Rock Island they must have had a bitter contest with Judge Moore and D. G. Reid, men who in at least one bitter fight got the best of Harriman. In developing Lehigh Valley according to their plans they must have incurred the bitter hostility of the Reading, Jersey Central, Lackawanna and Erie. In giving Wabash an outlet to the coast they would have had a joyous battle with the New York Central system on one side and the Pennsylvania on the other, to say nothing of the other trunk lines like Baltimore and Ohio. In the West they threw down the gauntlet first to the Goulds, from whom they proposed to take their choicest possessions. They disdained the power of James J. Hill, who doesn't want any transcontinental system while he controls the Great Northern, Northern Pacific and Burlington. Finally they recked not of the wishes of the richest of all systems, Union Pacific, with which they proposed to open a sharp struggle, nor did they seem to take into the reckoning the bankers for the Union Pacific and Pennsylvania, Kuhn, Loeb and Company, into whose hands the syndicate finally fell.

As the audacity of the venture loomed up more boldly it became known for the first time that the venturesome one of the syndicate leaders was not Dr. Pearson, the celebrated engineer and builder, but Percival Farquhar, generally supposed to have been a dull English follower of the brilliant engineer. It was he not Dr. Pearson that supplied the imagination, and one of the bankers who dealt with him declares that his imagination was astounding. Farquhar is a native born American, a college man and a club man who in his early days was a Tammany Assemblyman, Wall Street speculator and man about town, and later a soldier of fortune in South America, a promoter of South American enterprises, and finally now a capitalist of France, Brazil, England, the United States and the world generally, with headquarters in Paris. When his name first came out in connection with the transcontinental venture no one recognized him as the Farquhar who left New York twelve years ago. Monte Cristo on his reappearance was no more known to his early associates.

In South America Farquhar had a wonderful success, so wonderful that he is in high repute with bankers of Paris, who are known everywhere as the world's most conservative and cautious financiers. Some of the Brazil companies under his direction are the Southern Brazil Lumber Company, the Madeira-Mamora Railway, the Port of Para Company, the Sorocabana Railway and the Bahia Tramway, Light and Power. The Port of Para Company was one of the most singular. It planned the construction of a new port on an estuary of the Amazon with immense docks, deeply dredged harbors and railroads to save time in transportation to Rio de Janeiro. Dr. Pearson became associated with Farquhar in his South American business. The banker who noted that Farquhar had the most astounding of all imaginations noted also that he had remarkable power in impressing his ideas upon others. "He is erect," said this banker, "of soldierly carriage, and has as fine an address as I have ever seen in a human being. His appearance almost convinces you before he has uttered a word, but when is added to this a knowledge of men and of the world, a broad cosmopolitanism, a frank and candid manner and a rare facility of expression you have the most persuasive person one could meet." Moreover, the banker added, he is a man of great ability, and though in this case intrepidity overcame prudence, his plans are very carefully thought out. Paris bankers gave the highest endorsements of him to bankers with whom he dealt in New York. So sanguine was Farquhar of the success of his American undertaking that he had no more than begun the purchase of the stock in the roads he and Dr. Pearson sought to acquire before he bought costly residences in Paris and New York. The house he purchased in Paris was that owned by Rudolph Kann, possessor of the famous art collection which is one of the marvels of the Old World. In New York he bought a place in Fifth avenue, a corner on the block south of Carnegie's.

The great scheme of the Pearson Syndicate failed, but both Pearson and Farquhar remain men of great wealth and unimpaired prestige. They are not to be the dictators of American railroading but they have added a thrilling chapter to the history of American financial romance. And that is no unworthy achievement.

Eccentric

By Arthur Schnitzler (From the German)

Last night I was sitting in the cafe when suddenly somebody behind me said: "Ah, never—never again!"

I needn't have turned round; it was Gus. He was as handsome and trig as ever. With the extraordinary grace for which I have always silently envied him he sat down at my little table, opposite to me, without shedding the light overcoat that was just hanging over one shoulder, pulled the round, black, stiff little hat—about which more anon—down over his forehead, and called a waiter, who was leaning against the billiard-table reading a paper. It was half-past two in the morning, in May, and we were the last people in the place.

The waiter stepped up quickly. "Good evening, Herr von Witte."

"Good evening nothing—good Lord!—no merry words for me. Something to eat and drink."

"Right, sir, 'right. A demi-tasse, black? A cognac?"

Gus gazed sombrely at the waiter. "You lose," he said, "you lose. Bring me two sardines, two soft eggs in a hard glass, one ham sandwich and a bottle of beer."

The waiter disappeared. Gus took the paper from my hand and flung it upon another table. "I'd like you to take notice that I'm here."

"I notice it," I replied lightly. "Whence so late?"

"Whence?" said Gus, and gave me a doleful, devilish look. "A question I would never put to anyone at three in the morning, unless he happened to be in dinner clothes. But you are, and always will be, a bounder—yes," he added, giving a very fair imitation of one of our most popular comedians, "a bounder, a bounder."

I replied nothing, took a paper, and read awhile. Suddenly a curious warmth emanated from the sheet, and presently a review of Weinberger's new operetta began to glow and to smolder, and the tip of a burning cigarette appeared in the centre. But I only smiled slightly; so accustomed was I, through years of close association with Gus, to similar and usually much brighter tricks.

"Care for a bit of advice?" he asked suddenly.

"De-lighted," I answered politely.

Gus looked full at me and said sharply and clearly: "Anything, my boy, understand me, anything, except an eccentric chanteuse!"

"Of course, of course," said I.

"Anything," repeated Gus—"flower girls, ladies from Roumania traveling alone, piccolo players, chimney-sweeps' brides, tragediennes—anything, my boy, but no eccentrics!"

I gave him a ready nod. The waiter brought the order, and Gus began to eat and drink. But after the first taste of the beer he went on: "For with such creatures you're helpless, that's the awful truth. Let me explain. You discover your next best friend trying to steal your sweetheart; well, you simply challenge him; if he's a mere acquaintance you shoot him on the spot; if a perfect stranger, unless he's some howling swell, you simply give him a good licking. All these are cases where one knows what to do, because one is dealing with normal persons. But the things I have had to suffer from the first moment I saw and loved Mademoiselle Kitty de la Rosiere, up to this evening—"

"Good night," I said, and got up.

"Oh," cried Gus, "waiter, bar the door."

"Certainly, right away," said the waiter, who was almost as witty as Gus, as he jumped to the door and barred it.

"Sit down, my boy," said Gus. "I'll tell you a story. A story—" He gave a burlesque imitation of Irving in "The Bells," "to sear the very marrow in your bones. Les amours de Monsieur Auguste von Witte et de la tres jolie Kitty de la Rosiere. Henry, a Havana!" He leaned into his corner, rested his elbow on the window-ledge; the round, black, stiff little hat, about which more anon, was still on his head, the coat still on his shoulders, and he looked more interesting than ever. I was very sleepy, and nothing but the hope that my friend would tell me something thrilling kept me awake.

"She deceived me," he began.

"Ah!" said I, pleasantly moved.

"You will not suppose me so silly as to tell you that as if it were anything remarkable. You imagine that I was prepared for it; yet, at first, I hoped it might not happen. In that detail, by the way, I have reached great facility. I never visit my friends of the fair sex"—Gus has a trick, at times, of using some of the old school phrases—"at unexpected hours, I never read the letters that I casually find on the table, I immediately beat a rapid retreat from any public room where I may happen to hear their names on a stranger's lips, and if in spite of all these precautions I observe a thing or two, I simply don't believe it. But every precaution failed in the case of Kitty. Do you remember Little Pluck?"

"Certainly. Odious little beast."

"Kitty appears not to have thought so. I must premise that for an entire fortnight I was unspeakably happy with her. I used to drop around every evening after the performance. She always received me with the greatest cordiality. On that very evening there had been no other arrangement."

"On what evening?"

"The evening of Little Pluck's debut. The odious little beast, two and a quarter feet high, aged eighteen or fifty-nine. I walk in upon Kitty, as usual, sharp on time; whom do I find? Little Pluck, paying court to her. I was speechless. Although a mistake was practically out of the question, I waited for some sort of explanatory word from her—as, for instance, 'You misjudge.' But she never said the word. She looked at me with very large eyes, and spoke the never-to-be-forgotten words: 'Isn't it funny?' In the first instant, so deeply rooted are our instincts, my hand twitched; but when I looked at Little Pluck, that utterly ridiculous object—more ridiculous in that moment than words can suggest—my rage disappeared, and I told myself: 'You can neither kick a dwarf, nor yet can you fight a duel with him.' I simply took up Kitty's cue, said 'Very funny, very funny!' nodded, smiled, and went."

"So that's what happened today?"

"Today? No, that was two months ago. I forgave her. And for a few weeks we were very happy."

"Did Little Pluck play out his engagement?" I asked, smiling sardonically.

"I understand your insulting insinuation," replied Gus. "But I can assure you that Little Pluck, although he appeared for another month at Ronacher's Music Hall, was never again received by Kitty save in my presence. And on the evening of his last appearance I even gave Little Pluck a little supper in Kitty's rooms, and although he was as tight as a drum, he behaved like a book on manners, so that I allowed Kitty to give him a farewell kiss. Next morning he left for Trieste; we saw him off at the station, and Kitty cried. I wasn't sorry he went. But as you know, the Ronacher program changes."

"Oh!" said I.

The expression on my face at that moment may not have been over-flattering for Gus, since he threw a bread-roll at me—only by way of merry quip, of course, yet the quip had anger in it. While I put the roll into the bread-tray, Gus continued

"The place of Little Pluck on the program was filled by a number that made a genuine sensation. The foxy management—may they be boiled in oil!—engaged the Two Darlings, two giants from Tibet, the biggest brothers ever seen."

"Two!" cried I, without meaning anything in particular. But Gus must have misunderstood me, for he called me a brute.

"Still," he added, "you are on the right track. On the evening the Two Darlings made their first bow to the public I called, as usual, on Kitty. Why should I multiply words? I found only one of the two giants, but that was quite enough for me."

"For you?" I said, with such a cynical expression that I astonished even myself.

Gus glowered at me, then got up suddenly and shaped his lips to a fluent curse. Still, belonging, as you must have noticed, to the very best society, he controlled himself, sat down again, and continued, with something of resignation in his tone. "Kitty was cool, as always. The giant grinned at me, and at first seemed rather embarrassed. When he saw how cool Kitty was, however, he took the merry view of the matter, brought out a hearty laugh, which sounded like far-off thunder, and said to me: 'Good evening, sir. I am very glad to meet you. What can I do for you?' I'll not deny that I came very near exploding, but just in time I remembered the astonishing tricks I had seen only two hours before; those Two Darlings had lifted seven men at once into the air, had broken bars of iron and played ball with weights of a hundred pounds or so. So I suppressed my misgivings and measured Kitty with a look that she doubtless misread. For, instead of making excuses, she said, with that indescribable calmness of hers: 'You know, dearest, I don't understand a single word he says.' You'll allow that was a bit too thick, even for a man with more patience than I. My blood boiled; I felt that this scene was bound to have a horrible ending, and I left, without a word of good-bye."

"Churl!" said I.

"When I called on Kitty next day," Gus went on, without noticing my reproof, "she gave me as gay a greeting as ever. I had too much consideration to touch on the painful scene of the day before, and Kitty appeared to have forgotten it. Perhaps she imagined she had dreamed it—how do I know? The one thing sure is—so made of riddles are women!—that she loved me more than ever that day. That very evening I was in a box at Ronacher's again. The Two Darlings came on, and as they were so alike that one could not possibly tell them apart I had not the least idea which of the two I had met at Kitty's. I fancy even Kitty herself has never been quite certain

Union Labor Exaction

Every once in a while I have occasion to record an example of the exactions of union labor. It is probable that none of the instances I have given were quite as typical as that to which my attention has just been called. The two janitors of the Hall of Justice in Eddy street were in the habit of devoting about twenty minutes every Saturday morning to the disinfecting of the floors and corridors of the building. This was done by means of carbolic acid and other chemicals combined with elbow grease. In twenty minutes the two workers gave the floors a vigorous swabbing which assisted materially in sweetening the atmosphere of the police courts and other rooms. Recently the painters' union discovered what the two janitors were doing and registered a loud objection. It was pointed out that the work which the two janitors were doing was not janitors' work but painters' work. What was the result? Simply this—five painters are now employed every Saturday to paint the floors with disinfecting mixtures and what the two janitors did in twenty minutes it takes the high-priced painters all day to accomplish.

When a Judge Lays Aside His Dignity

Judge Lawlor's indiscreet display of partisan prejudice in the Calhoun case is not without precedent as one may learn from almost any of the numerous histories of the bar and biographies of eminent lawyers. Nor is the resentment of an insult from the bench without precedent. Indeed there is very high authority sanctioning prompt retaliation when a lawyer is brutally and wantonly insulted by a hooligan of the judiciary. A notable instance of such retaliation occurred in the life of John Philpot Curran, the Irish orator. The circumstances are related by James A. L. Whittier in his memoir to Curran's speeches as follows:

"In some instances, it is true, where the case on trial had a political aspect, the judges forgot to be impartial, and allowed their prejudices to lead them into displays of feeling towards counsel, not always creditable to themselves or productive of satisfactory results. This was especially true in the early part of Curran's career, but he made himself respected and feared ere long, and was freed from unpleasantnesses of this kind. It is related of him that, in one of his first cases argued before a Judge Robinson, who had won an unequaled notoriety as an anonymous pamphleteer, he said that he had never met the law as laid down by his lordship in any book in his library. 'That may be, sir,' said the judge contemptuously, 'but I suspect that your library is very small.' The young barrister, roused by the sneer at his circumstances, replied that true it was his library might be small, but he thanked Heaven that among his books there were none of the 'wretched publications of the frantic pamphleteers of the day. I find it more instructive my Lord to study good works than to compose bad ones; my books may be few, but the title-pages give me the writers' names; my shelf is not disgraced by any of such rank absurdity that their very authors are ashamed to own them.' He was here interrupted by the judge, who said, 'Sir, you are forgetting the respect which you owe to the dignity of the judicial character.' 'Dignity!' exclaimed Curran; 'my Lord upon that point I shall cite you a case from a book of some authority, with which you are perhaps not unacquainted. A poor Scotchman, upon his arrival in London, thinking himself insulted by a stranger, and imagining that he was the stronger man, resolved to resent the affront, and, taking off his coat, delivered it to a bystander to hold; but having lost the battle he turned to resume his garment, when he discovered that unfortunately he had lost that also; that the trustee of his habiliments had decamped during the affray. So my Lord when the person who is invested with the dignity of the judgment-seat lays it aside for a moment to enter into a disgraceful personal contest, it is in vain, when he is worsted in the encounter, that he seeks to resume it—it is in vain that he endeavors to shelter himself behind an authority which he has abandoned.'"

Lawlor and Robinson Contrasted

Now Judge Robinson, unlike Judge Lawlor, did not avail himself of his prerogative. Yet Judge Robinson did not give Curran so much provocation as Judge Lawlor gave the attorneys in the Calhoun case. Judge Robinson merely sneered at Curran's library, and he gave the attorney the privilege of retorting. Judge Lawlor sneered at Stanley Moore's methods of practicing law. He intimated that Moore was in the habit of resorting to the press to accomplish what he could not accomplish in court. And this he did after making a part of the records of the court a document that was clearly intended for publication and for nothing else. There was nothing in that document of a judicial character. It was fabricated of surmises, innuendoes, suspicions and gossip, none of which was borne out by evidence and some of which were baldly at variance with facts in possession of the court. It can be properly characterized as nothing but a raw piece of scandal intended for popular consumption. And after handing it out for the press Judge Lawlor gratuitously insulted the attorney who asked leave to reply and then committed him to jail for daring to exercise a fundamental right. Judge Robinson did not go that far. When John Philpot Curran ended his parable Judge Robinson said: "If you say another word, sir, I'll commit you."

"If your Lordship should do so," said Curran "we shall both of us have the consolation of reflecting that I am not the worst thing your Lordship has committed."

And still the judge restrained himself. But it is reported by the author of the memoir that Judge Robinson afterwards sought to induce the bench to deprive Curran of his gown, and received so little encouragement that he thought it prudent to proceed no further in the affair.

Frank Mulgrew's Luck

Frank L. Mulgrew, Call reporter and Bohemian clubman, has just done a bit of writing which will net him at least $50,000. "Mul," as he is known to the confraternity of the pad and pencil, has written neither a novel nor a play; he has made his fortune in a much simpler manner—by inditing a letter. As it is not often that the writing of a letter brings a man $50,000 the story of Mulgrew's luck is worth telling. Mulgrew is as well known among the newspapermen as his father, John Mulgrew, the proprietor of Mark West Springs, is among the landowners of northern California. It is doubtful, however, if any of "Mul's" friends knew a few weeks ago that he owned a third interest in a mine. The fact was not of particular importance until Mulgrew wrote a letter about the mine and then it became a fact of golden promise. When the correspondence started by that letter had been brought to a conclusion Mulgrew was the richest newspaper reporter in the city.

The Letter to Stokes

Some time ago Mulgrew made the acquaintance of relatives of F. A. Stokes of Minneapolis and New York, a promoter and fiscal agent. Taking advantage of this fact he sat down and wrote Stokes a letter of six typewritten pages. This letter contained the history of the Little Climax mine situated six miles from Jackson in Amador County. Mulgrew told Stokes that the Little Climax was "not a prospect, nor a mere hole in the ground, but a real California gold mine that has been tried and proven." He told how it had been discovered by Mexicans in the late sixties, worked by an arastra and other crude devices and made to yield rich yellow gold. He told how afterwards it fell into the hands of an old man who erected a little stamp mill and drove a fifty-foot shaft on the main ledge. "When he wanted a sack of flour," wrote Mulgrew, "he went into the mine and took out $100. He then went to Jackson, purchased the flour and spent the remaining $98 for whiskey. It was a natural treasury, burglar-proof and convenient."

The Mine's Later History

Mulgrew went on to state that the Little Climax fell into other hands; that the new owners spent $30,000 on it and mined and milled about 2,000 tons of ore that assayed $10 a ton, the working expense being $2.50 a ton. He described how one owner went to Germany on a pleasure trip and died there; and how the others, "scared at the fine body of ore" they had struck, went to Germany to buy out the dead man's heirs. Then the earthquake came along and owing to the ground movement the main shaft caved in and the mine filled with water. Mulgrew acquired an interest in the Little Climax while he was at the University of California. The other owners are E. C. Ambrose of the well known grocery firm in Oakland and Dr. P. Aiken of Jackson. Mulgrew told Stokes that the owners wanted $5,000 to pump out the water and $50,000 to sink the shaft and he asked the financier to get him the money. "Like all other good Americans," he wrote, "we are somewhat in a hurry to eat our cake. I for one am willing to take half of the loaf of sweet now."

The Letter Made a Hit

This was not a letter of the hackneyed kind that reaches promoters and financiers with every mail. It was breezy, picturesque and it made a big hit with Stokes. He sent out an agent to investigate what Mulgrew had stated, found everything as represented and organized the Gold, King Mine and Milling Company to buy the Little Climax. The price ran into six figures and Mulgrew's share is not less than $50,000. The name of the mine will be changed to the Gold King and $150,000 will be spent on development work. Although the mine has only been worked on the surface it is estimated that about $100,000 has been taken out and it is said that it is going to prove an unusually rich property. I believe that Chief of Police Martin is interested in the property now. Having acquired his "loaf of sweet" Mulgrew is thinking of taking a leisurely trip to Europe to perfect his varied and curious knowledge of mankind.

In her trim little bathing suit she sat on the white sand.

"I adore intelligence," she cried.

"So do I," said he. "All the same, though, beauty and intellect never go together."

"And do you think me intellectual?" she faltered.

"No," he confessed frankly.

With a faint flush she murmured: "Flatterer."

The Death of Charlie Schultz

Word comes from Hamburg that Charlie Schultz is dead. Thus is severed another of the few remaining links that bind the old San Francisco to the new. Schultz was one of the best known of our elder musicians. He was the first leader of the orchestra of the old California theater which made theatrical history that will never be forgotten. Barton Hill, Madame Juda, Mestayer, McCullough, Barrett, Booth and the rest of those old-time stars of the stage were his close friends and many a good story could he tell of their ups and downs. During the Vigilante days Schultz was a member of the Volunteer Fire Department and like many others of that sturdy band fire-fighting was a passion with him. As a musician Schultz ranked very high, having been a pupil of the celebrated Louis Spohr. He was on a visit in Germany when death overtook him.

Tully's New Play

Dick Tully started East a few days ago with a play which, he confided to some of his friends, is "the greatest show in the world." It is called "The Bird of Paradise" and will be produced by the New Theater. Tully has already received $1,000 and has made a good contract with the New Theater people. What the theme of "The Bird of Paradise" may be is still a secret and certainly the title is hardly a revealing one. Dick Tully has made a great deal of money out of "The Rose of the Rancho," but not nearly as much as David Belasco who carpentered the play into shape. Another play of his, "Cupid the Cow Punch" was produced at Ye Liberty Playhouse in Oakland some time ago, but I have not heard of it since. It was crude but contained excellent material. I recall an act in which the denizens of Carmel were satirized which was particularly amusing.

"The Cave Man"

For the thirty-third time the midsummer high jinks of the Bohemian Club has come and gone and another remarkable achievement has been added to a list of which Bohemia may well be proud. This year it was Charles K. Field who wrote the grove play, his work being entitled "The Cave Man." In the list of our poets Field's name has not a conspicuous place, a condition for which there seems to be only one reason; namely, that Field has not seen fit to make the pursuit of poetical inspiration the main business of his life. Those who have seen Field's occasional pieces know that it has been his privilege to breathe the atmosphere of the sacred mount and with that knowledge they will eagerly welcome the opportunity to acquaint themselves with the text of "The Cave Man." For in the recently enacted grove play Field has not fallen short of expectations. He has performed most worthily a difficult task. He has flung his mind and his imagination back across the abyss of the centuries and has depicted for us the prehistoric man, the creature well nigh unintelligible to us who lived in a cave, felled his prey with a rock, tore the quivering flesh with his fingers and ate it raw and feared the forest night because he had not yet penetrated the secret of kindling fire. It is not easy to make that ancestor of our civilization a convincing human being, but Field possesses the dramatic as well as the poetical faculty and he has accomplished the task.

The Story of the Play

Field's hero is Long Arm, so called because he has lengthened his arm for purposes of combat by devising the first axe of wood and stone. He is cousin-german to Prometheus and his story, strangely enough, suggests in some wise the story of Hamlet. Years before the action of the drama commences Long Arm's uncle had lusted for his brother's wife and had gained her by the treacherous slaying of his brother. The boy Long Arm had escaped from the forest to the shore where he had been reared to manhood by the Shell People and when the play begins he has returned to avenge his father's death by killing his uncle. That uncle is Broken Foot, the bully of the forest caves, and there is only rejoicing when he lays him low with a blow of his axe. Then Long Arm, having taken possession of his father's cave, accidentally discovers fire by chipping at a rock with his axe. There follows his wooing of Singing Bird, a beautiful maiden, and his fight with the terrible Man-Beast, "the beast that walks like a man" whom he puts to flight with a fire-brand. But the Man-Beast returns to seize Long Arm's mate and in the struggle that follows the forest is fired and despair possesses the cave men until the rain comes to quell the flames. "Hark, it is the call of the rain! Water kills fire. It is the voice of a great power that befriends us. Oh, hear it, hear it, it is the voice of God!" Darkness comes as these words of Long Arm are uttered and the drama is at an end. There is an epilogue of ambitious symbolism wherein the gradual ascent of man from the low estate of the cave to the height of intellectual attainment is typified by a procession mounting higher and higher until the line which embraces cave men, shepherds, farmers, warriors and philosophers is headed by the apparition of "Him who spoke the Sermon on the Mount."

A Gradual Evolution

The grove plays of the Bohemian Club constitute the only examples of a distinct art form which has been evolved in the beautiful redwood forest by the Russian River. The evolution has carried the grove play beyond its original purpose. In the beginning the Cremation of Care was the ceremony about which the play was built, but by degrees this purpose has been lost sight of, although the old ceremony is retained. Last year instead of symbolizing Care, as most of the other writers of grove plays had done, Professor Morse Stephens in his "St. Patrick at Tara" included the Victim of Care as one of his characters. This year Field has eliminated the idea of Care from his drama altogether. It is a natural development and it makes for roominess, so to say, giving the dramatist a freer play for his fancy. I did not see the play in the grove, but I am told that it was splendidly acted. Certainly it seems to me that the cast was happily selected. David Bispham played Long Arm and Judge Melvin Broken Face while Amedee Joullin as the Man-Beast and Dick Hotaling as the maiden are said to have given very sympathetic interpretations of their roles.

A Casino Contretemps

When our jolly yachtsmen were at Santa Cruz recently a grand banquet and a grander ball were given in their honor. It was a very joyous occasion and the merriment waxed as the night waned. With the coming of the wee sma hours hilarity reigned supreme and the dance became a romp. In the party of yachtsmen was a well known prizefight promoter who was squiring a young lady of unusual pulchritude and charm. Needless to say this young lady received her share of gallant attention and up to a certain point the prizefight promoter felt only pride in seeing his lady fair the belle of the occasion. But another feeling succeeded. It may have been that he had somewhat o'er generously heated his imagination with wine, but at any rate when he saw his lady fair two-stepping with every indication of pleasure with one of the most popular yachtsmen in the State, discretion fled at the approach of the green-eyed monster. Seizing a handy wine bottle he took careful aim and shied it at the object of his wrath. If the object of his wrath hadn't dodged at the psychological moment there would have been a calamity. As it was the bottle sailed through a window and the gaping hole in the pane remained next day as the only sign of a moment's irritation.

The Gopcevic Project

The spirit of adventure will never desert the Gopcevic bosom. Romance circulates with the Gopcevic blood and the commonplace is foreign to their nature. To dare the impossible and to achieve the improbable is part of their ordinary actions. Equally in love and war their deeds smack of antique chivalry. A Gopcevic will start a revolution or marry an heiress with equal gusto. Just at present it is Spiridion Gopcevic who is in the public eye. Spiridion is organizing a treasure hunt to rescue untold wealth from the waters of the Spanish Main. There have been many treasure hunts in the past and all of them have been unsuccessful, but I am not so sure that Spiridion Gopcevic will not win where others have lost. Luck is part of his inheritance. A remarkable man is this Spiridion. He is a cousin of Milos Gopcevic whose first wife was Harry Floyd and whose recent marriage to Miss Marion Dodd will be readily recollected. Spiridion Gopcevic is a man of high scientific attainment; among other things an astronomer of fame. At one time he had charge of an astronomical observatory at the head of the Adriatic and his standing among the searchers of the heavens was of the best.

The Keeler Incident

Speaking of Spiridion's astronomical attainments reminds me of a story. In the course of his studies the astronomical work of Professor Keeler of Stanford came to his attention and he wrote a lengthy analysis and appreciation of Keeler's discoveries for a German magazine of science. It was a masterly review and Professor Keeler acknowledged his indebtedness to the star-gazer of the Adriatic. That article in the German paper was well nigh forgotten when the first wife of Milos Gopcevic died and an attempt was made by the envious to deprive him of her big estate. Among others who testified at the remarkable trial in little Lakeport was Mrs. Keeler, the wife of Professor Keeler. Her testimony was to the effect that Harry Floyd Gopcevic's mind must have been deranged, otherwise she would not have married into a family of inferior standing. After that remarkable bit of testimony somebody remembered the article in which one of that "family of inferior standing" had paid the tribute of scientific appreciation to Professor Keeler's achievements. Strange, is it not, how these things eventuate?

"Young Green says he is working for all he is worth."

"Well, I suppose that's another way of saying that he's earning ten dollars a week."

Campaign Barrels

A great deal of money has gone into politics in this direct primary campaign, more money than was ever spent in a State campaign since the days of that prince of spenders with the elastic leg, the late Senator Leland Stanford. Some very big barrels have been broached for the benefit of aspirants for office, and pactolian streams have been flowing to the remotest corners of the State producing signs of prosperity in large and small centres of activity and diminishing complaints against the high cost of living. From what I regard as good authority I learn that by far the largest barrel broached for the campaign is that which has been at the service of the Hon. Charles F. Curry, whose innumerable captains have been throwing money to the birds and also spending it like drunken sailors for the purpose of imparting to the spectacular progress of his candidacy something of the aspect of a Roman triumph. The State has been littered with fine specimens of the lithographer's art that everybody might become familiar with the statesman-like visage and aristocratic poise of the distinguished Secretary of State. The circulation of this counterfeit presentment is greater than that of all the metropolitan dailies combined. But the cost of this item is a mere bagatelle compared with the cost of some of the other items. Automobile hire, for example, has consumed fully one-fourth of the contents of the Curry barrel. I have heard that in Alameda County alone every man who is expected to vote for Curry has had at least one automobile ride at his expense. This Curry barrel, it is said, was supplied by Mr. Adolph Spreckels, as a sort of counter-irritant to the barrel which his brother Rudolph opened for the Hon. Hiram Johnson. Commenting on this clash of Spreckels' interests the other day a veteran politician observed that as Curry was doing nothing but making it harder for Anderson it would be funny if the result showed that Adolph's money had been spent for the benefit of Rudolph.

Wise's Burning Zeal

Otto Irving Wise, attorney and boulevardier, has raised an absorbing question of ethics. Has the borrower of a book the right to destroy it if he finds its moral tone "pestilential"? Wise thinks that he has and being a man with the courage of his convictions, has destroyed an evil volume not his own. But the owner protested and the ethical dispute has been convulsing the town ever since. The owner of the book is a nephew of Abe Hummell and until quite recently was a friend of Wise. But friendship flew out through the window when the book was placed in Wise's hands. Just how carefully Wise perused the tome I cannot say. Whether he received a moral shock as soon as he scanned the first page or whether he conned the volume from title to colophon before its "pestilential" character was clear to his mind, must ever remain a dark secret. Wise has given few particulars, evidently because the subject is not one on which a stern moralist cares to expatiate. But the fact remains that Wise flamed with a chaste zeal that would have done credit to Savonarola and made auto da fe of the offending book. But had he the right to do this? Has any man the right to destroy borrowed property, even in an excess of holy zeal? How can a man say that a book which is "pestilential" to him is also "pestilential" to its owner? Is the book borrower the keeper of the book owner's conscience? Aside from the ethical question, there is the practical question of the example which Wise has set. Suppose I lend an innocuous but valuable volume to a friend who makes unscrupulous profit of Wise's holy example? In other words, suppose my friend pretends to be shocked and sends me word that in his indigna-

Election Cards Frappe

Gus Hartman who is actively engaged in racing four other candidates for the State senatorship in the twenty-fourth district and who swears by the Dewey Monument which stands in the middle of his bailiwick that he is going to win the nomination, met Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel on the street a few days ago. Dinkelspiel had just returned from Tahoe and with the enthusiasm of a born disciple of old Izaak expatiated on his successful vacation, finally promising to send half a dozen large trout to Gus at his hotel. The little senator gave instructions at the hotel that when a package arrived there addressed to him it should be put in the ice box. Then he bled him forth and invited Henry Ach and five other friends to a trout dinner. When the day came Hartman went to the ice box to get his fish and lifted out a large package of chilled and dripping—election cards! The fish have not yet arrived and the dinner has been postponed, but Dinkelspiel promises that he will go back to the lake and make amends for the carelessness of the express company.

Pete Kyne's Success

I have already taken occasion in these columns to refer to the stories which Peter Kyne, a local youngster, has been writing for the Saturday Evening Post. In less than a twelvemonth Kyne has reached the enviable position where the Post is eager to publish his stories and other magazines are bidding for them. During the past month Kyne has had two stories in the Post and they compared favorably with any fiction which that paper has published in many a day. Both were full of local color and had to do with deeds within the memory of many. One was called "Maggie Mulrenin, Mudhen" and the other, "The Log of the Courtenay Ford." It may be of interest to know that Kyne's income from his fiction during the past year has been $4,000. For his last story in the Post he received $450. The figures may help doubters to decide whether or not it is possible to make a living by the pen.

The Embarrassment of a "Colonel"

Raleigh P. Hooe has been for years a clerk in the Board of Education where his dapper appearance and his immaculately groomed, if not soldierly, figure have earned for him the sobriquet of "the colonel." A short time ago Hooe paid a visit to Seattle and a perverse fate impelled him to sign his name to the register of the Washington Hotel as "Colonel" Raleigh P. Hooe. On the following day he was very much surprised when a delegation of army officers from Vancouver Barracks waited on him to extend the freedom of the city and other courtesies. It was an embarrassing situation and Hooe, realizing its unpleasant possibilities, hemmed and hawed and finally explained that he was not of the regular army but only a militia colonel. Then it was the turn of the army officers to be surprised. They said that although they had not consulted an Army Register they had been under the impression that there was a Colonel Hooe at the Presidio of San Francisco. And then, fearing to wound the susceptibilities of a militia colonel, they laid out plans for his entertainment. Poor Hooe had visions of being exposed as an impostor and spent most of his time in Seattle dodging the army officers who were intent on entertaining him. Just before leaving the city he went to the hotel register and wrote after his name, "of the Salvation Army."

Tom Fox's Adventure

Mr. and Mrs. Tom Fox of Sacramento have returned after a very enjoyable tour of China and Japan. In his capacity of democratic boss of Sacramento Tom is of course very interested in gathering together the scattered threads of politics, but he has time to tell the story of his travels. His most exciting experience took place in Nanking. Mr. and Mrs. Fox went to Nanking in June to see the Viceroy open the exposition. Leaving the steamer they put up at the Bridge House outside the walled city and on the morning of the opening started out in a conveyance to attend the ceremony. They were leaving the hotel when a white man rushed in breathless with haste and warned them to turn back as there was a riot among the Chinese within the walls. The commander of the American gunboat New Orleans which was in the river arrived immediately afterwards and repeated the warning. He explained that the inrush of visitors had alarmed the Chinese who feared that the crowds would make the price of food go up. In anticipation of trouble 13,000 Chinese infantry and 7,000 cavalry had been concentrated in the city and there were eight gunboats in the Yangtse, two Chinese two Japanese, two English and one American and one French. The unrest had become a riot on the morning of the opening of the exposition and the Viceroy only got through the ceremony when the 20,000 troops had cowed the rioters. Meanwhile all white people had been warned to leave and Mr. and Mrs. Fox escaped from the hotel at two of the following morning and took refuge on the steamer which immediately took its passengers to Hankow where they were beyond the reach of violence.

One Cause of the Unrest

Speaking of the unrest in China reminds me that another traveler who returned recently from the orient gave me a rather astonishing reason for a great deal of the trouble there. He said it was largely due to the offensive proselytizing methods and unpopular conduct of the missionaries who are scattered up and down the empire. He added that the only religious bodies which were tolerated by the Chinese were the Sisters of Mercy and the Jesuits who do an immense amount of charitable work without trying to spread their religious propaganda or make converts. He repeated to me the rebuke which an influential Chinese administered to an unpopular American missionary in the lower Yangtse valley: "You won't have us in your country but you want to send us to your heaven."

Houston—How do you suppose the Egyptians managed to get the pyramids where they are?

Mulberry—Oh, their Congressmen probably franked them.

A "Cabinet" in Portland

Judge Thomas Graham on his return from Portland the other day reported that a branch of the "Cabinet" had been established in Oregon and that a round table was flourishing at the Hotel Portland. For which benefaction Oregon is indebted to James H. O'Brien, the railroad builder, founder and chief of the California Cabinet, and prophet of a new school of philosophy which teaches that the first duty of a philosopher is to part with self-conceit. This is the philosophy that obtains at the "Cabinet" table in the Palace Hotel, where every day at the noon hour an impromptu symposium varied in its topics is conducted. Here assemble men of every profession, men of diverse interests, men from all parts of the State. The complexion of the assemblage varies with the days of the week. Everybody is eligible to membership who has sense enough not to take himself seriously; and to propagate this sense men are admitted to membership on probation. Some very estimable gentlemen have been educated out of pomposity at a Cabinet symposium and rendered quite tolerable. Even reformers have been taken in and reformed. So there is reason for felicitating Oregon on having formed the acquaintance of James H. O'Brien, who is now reconstructing the telephone system of Portland and sharpening the faculties of its citizens.

Bierce Likes the Russian River

Ambrose Bierce who since his arrival in California has been living quietly in Berkeley, went up to Bohemian Grove to attend the grove play and the annual jinks. Since then, in company with his brother and George Sterling, the poet whose "Wine of Wizardry" he acclaimed the greatest of American poems, he has been loitering along the banks of the Russian River in the vicinity of Monte Rio. I understand that Bierce is delighted with that section of Sonoma County and that he has rhapsodized about the beauties of the Russian River in a fashion to excite the envy of his poetical companion. But as Bierce's poetical efforts have nearly all been couched in terms of satire and invective it is not likely that

Kent's Message to His Mother

William Kent, the Marin County millionaire who is running for Congress against Duncan McKinlay, is evidently under no misapprehension about the cost of doing politics in the second district. He knows that a candidate must spend a lot of money for his legitimate campaign expenses and yet he is not dismayed. Some time ago Kent's mother commenced the building of a summer home on Lake Tahoe and in her letters to her son made it evident that she was modifying her original plans on account of the expense of building in that locality. Whereupon Kent sent his mother a message to this general effect: "Dear Mother: Go right ahead with your plans. Order whatever you wish and don't mind the cost. If you don't spend the money it will only go into politics." Considering the extent of the Kent fortune it is quite likely that no matter how elaborate that Tahoe place may be there will still be plenty left for the campaign.

The Cause of the Hoodoo?

Several weeks ago I called attention to the remarkable number of courts-martial in the Twelfth Infantry stationed at Manila. The list of officers who had been under fire included the colonel, the lieutenant-colonel, a captain, a lieutenant and the chaplain, and I mentioned that on account of its many troubles the regiment is considered by some superstitious soldiers to be suffering from a hoodoo. Now it is being said in Manila that the troubles in the regiment are due to the friction between General Duvall, commanding the Philippine Division, and the regimental officers serving under him. It seems that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with General Duvall's conduct of affairs in the islands. It is alleged that the commanding general is highly excitable and that he is constantly at loggerheads with members of his staff. There is no doubt that the climate of Manila is a trying one and that it affects the temper of Americans who are exposed to it for a protracted period. Here may be an explanation of the troubles of the Twelfth Infantry. At any rate I understand that Secretary of War Dickinson has been making a personal investigation of conditions and the results may be made apparent when he returns. General Duvall, by the way, is to be relieved by Major-General Bell this fall and will go on the retired list for age in January.

An Old School Journalist

The old school of journalism which long since ceased to play a prominent part in the affairs of this country lost one of its most distinguished representatives last week when Harvey Scott, editor of the Portland Oregonian, died in Baltimore. The Oregonian under the editorship of Harvey Scott became one of the most influential of American newspapers, and at his death it ranked above any other daily on this coast by reason of the influence which it wielded. San Francisco has papers with a larger circulation than that of the Oregonian but none which commands the respect enjoyed by the Portland daily by reason of the sincerity of its utterances, its courage and its devotion to principle. Scott was an old-fashioned journalist in the sense of his adherence to the notion that it is the duty of a newspaper rather to lead public opinion than to coddle or follow the mob. He never catered to the vulgar appetite for the kind of news that yellow journalism loves to exploit. News of scandals was his pet abomination. He was never quite so indignant as on one occasion when his news editor printed an account of a prize-fight on the first page. Nevertheless the Oregonian is a newsy paper and it spends money liberally to get the news. It is the only paper published on this coast that keeps its readers in touch with matters of national interest.

Peck Takes Jordan's Measure

The local papers did not publish a tithe of what Professor Harry Thurston Peck, late of Columbia University, said about President David Starr Jordan in answer to Jordan's fling at Peck. Professor Peck paid his respects to the overlord of Stanford at considerable length. His words were undraped. He gave the California prexy the credit of only one sort of knowledge; he acknowledged that Jordan knew fish. There are men who know Jordan better than Peck does who are unwilling even to concede him that distinction. But let us give a selection from Peck's causerie on Jordan as reported by the New York Sun: "I have read what Dr. Jordan said about me and Mr. Butler and how he sympathizes with the president. Dr. Jordan said that Mr. Butler couldn't have done otherwise than what he did. As a matter of fact Mr. Butler did nothing. He merely tried to and it was presently found that he was acting contrary to the statutes of the university. It naturally would never occur to President Jordan that a university should be governed by statutes rather than by an academic boss. President Jordan is quoted as saying that a professor ought to be 'bounced' for financial crookedness or immorality. Exactly, but it never occurred to President Jordan that such crookedness or immorality should first be proved. He himself 'bounced' Professor Howard and Professor Pease some years ago because he did not like their politics, but Columbia is governed in a different way. Dr. Jordan is a good example of how a professor when he gets to be president loses all sympathy with his former associates and falls into another class. University presidents naturally approve of one another. President Jordan is quoted as saying that Mr. Butler is a 'big, strong man.' I have observed that whenever a college president calls another a big, strong man one of the two men is always a combination of an academic butcher, barkeeper and bandit. Dr. Jordan is unfit to be a college president. He knows a good deal about fishes, but in everything that relates to humanism he is a very ignorant man."

The Carlist Pretender

A certain ambiguity in despatches may have led those who are following the current controversy between Madrid and the Vatican to the impression that Don Jaime, the Carlist pretender to the crown of Spain, was personally present at San Sebastian and had there issued a proclamation to his followers to the effect that "the time is near at hand." San Sebastian is but twelve miles from the French frontier and has always been the first objective of Carlist raiders. It is not the stronghold that it once was, but the city is dominated by as near an approach to a first-class fortress as Spain has. For Don Jaime to be in San Sebastian would be as significant as for an armed pretender to the presidency of the United States to have his headquarters at Fort Monroe. The latest version of the incident is that Don Jaime's proclamation, not Don Jaime himself, has appeared in San Sebastian, and this of itself may portend some very interesting developments. The city is the metropolis of a region which has always had strong Carlist proclivities, and has furnished many recruits and not a few leaders to the Carlist armies.

A Little History

If we should see Carlist armies afoot again in Spain, they would afford evidence of the vitality of "a lost cause," a cause which has disturbed not alone Spain but Europe frequently in the last eighty years and appeals strongly to the good wishes of European "legitimists." Carlism takes its name and date from Don Carlos, the brother of Ferdinand VII. Ferdinand about 1830 set aside by royal decree the salic law, which excluded females from the throne, in favor of his infant daughter, afterwards Queen Isabella. This decree, whose constitutionality is and probably ever will be a matter of dispute to Spanish legists, set aside Don Carlos who would otherwise have been indisputably heir apparent. Don Carlos after protesting in words for several years against his deprivation began in 1834 to protest in arms. A terrible civil war followed, which ended only in 1840 with the defeat of the Carlists. Queen Christina, the mother of Isabella and regent of the kingdom, was less odious to progressive Spaniards than Carlos, and gained their support, but even then she might have failed but for the indirect assistance given her by England, France and Portugal.

It May Happen Again

Poor Spain was long in recovering from the exhaustion following the first Carlist war, and must in the worst days of Isabella's reign have comforted itself with the reflection that there was better chance of life in the frying pan than in the fire. After several abortive raids in the interval, the second Carlist war began in 1873 and was not stamped out until after three years of hard fighting. This later Don Carlos, who inherited the blood and claims of the original, was a better soldier; his army was no mere mob, but was capable of conducting regular sieges and was eminently soldierly, recruited as it was from some of the hardiest people in Spain. Whether Don Jaime will go beyond words remains to be seen, as does the attitude of the people of the north of Spain. If they should flock to his banners as they did to those of his ancestors the Europe of 1910 might witness a spectacle strangely out of date, of a pretender in arms seeking to cut his way to a constitutional throne with the sword. Carlism stands for reaction. The Carlists want to turn back the hands of the clock of time with the sword. The Carlists have always had the active support of that extreme class of Clericals known as the Ultramontanes. Carlism also appeals to local and regional prejudices by its promise to restore those "privileges" and provincial customs that have been extinguished in the unification of Spain which was once a federated monarchy. The feeling of the mountaineers towards Carlism is very similar to the attachment the Scotch Highlanders of the eighteenth century had for the Stuart cause, and Don Carlos and his heirs are very like the exiled Stuarts in their notions of royal prerogative.

for the office he is seeking and seems to be in the lead for the nomination.

For Superintendent of Schools

To inaugurate the competitive system for the selection of public school teachers is no small achievement and it stands to the credit of Alfred Roncovieri, the superintendent of schools, that he accomplished this much needed reform. Mr. Roncovieri is a candidate once more and it is to be hoped that the popular verdict on Tuesday will be returned in favor of the work which he has done. An untiring executive Mr. Roncovieri has combined sympathy with tact in his relations with the members of the school department. He is the logical man for the place and it would be unfortunate if he should be compelled to give over his office to a successor at a time when much of his work is still in the evolutionary stage.

Keesling's Candidacy

Francis V. Keesling, the well known attorney of this city, is the only northern aspirant for the lieutenant-governorship on the republican ticket. The other three candidates all come from the country south of Tehachapi. This fact is regarded as a significant one in the present campaign and the strategic advantage of Mr. Keesling's position has not been lost sight of by those who are aiding in his fight. Mr. Keesling is equipped for the duties of the office he seeks and his canvass has evoked a great deal of enthusiasm. Many conservative judges of political events are forecasting his success in the approaching election.

The big yellow moon climbed above the trees. "Be careful, Romeo," cautioned the fair Juliet, "if papa hears you there will be trouble."

"But what objection has he to me?" said Romeo, somewhat piqued. "Didn't you tell him I move in the best of society?"

"Yes, dear, but he insists that you are only a climber."

And then and there Romeo decided to cut out the balcony scene and make love out on the lawn.

The English Way

Gilbert K. Chesterton, essayist, story-writer and master of paradox, is never so happy as when he is telling his countrymen what he considers the truth about themselves. The following paragraph which has just come from his pen is characteristic. If an Irishman had written it he would have been denounced; if an American, he would have been called an Anglophobe. But here is an Englishman talking out in meeting:

It is proverbial, of course, that England is politically attached to that process which some call proceeding step by step, and others call taking two bites of a cherry. We may indeed question the universal truth of this description. Englishmen, after all, have done one or two violent and definite things. King Charles the First's head, I regret to say, was not sawn off slowly, but struck off sharply, with what the curate in "The Private Secretary" called a good hard knock. The English aristocrats of the Revolution did not nibble at James II. like a cherry; they dropped him like a hot potato. Neither did they nibble at William of Orange like a cherry; rather, they swallowed him—like a pill. The massacre of Wexford and the slaughter after Culloden left nothing to be desired as far as thoroughness is concerned. The late Cecil Rhodes was an Evolutionist in a foggy sort of way; but the Jameson Raid was not at all evolutionary. And whenever there has been the smallest chance of tyrannizing over anybody in Ireland the English Parliament has displayed a bounding swiftness and dazzling rapidity of action which confounded and rebuked those who had sneered at its slowness in all other matters. But though we may have shown some slight haste in the meaner matters of fear or avarice, we can honestly claim that we have shown a responsible and judicious slowness in the higher department of human good.

A Novelty in Announcements

The progressive engagement announcement seems to be the very latest novelty in polite society. Students of social form have had their attention called to the new method on account of the manner in which the engagement of Mrs. Olivia Hastings to Mr. Archibald Barnard was communicated to the public. On last Monday the announcement was made anonymously, so to speak; that is to say, it was merely given out that Mrs. Olivia Hastings was engaged to Mr. Archibald Barnard. On Tuesday the weight of authority was given to the announcement when Mrs. John T. Darling, the head of the Hastings clan, announced the engagement of her sister-in-law Mrs. Olivia Hastings to Mr. Archibald Barnard. Finally on Wednesday Mrs. Olivia Hastings announced the engagement herself. The new mode, like all innovations, is the footsteps of his grandfather, the late Judge Wallace, by winning distinction at the bar. Unlike his brilliant grandsire, however, Wallace does not begin life as a poor boy. He is not dependent on his own exertions. He is an only son and his mother inherited a large fortune from her father, the late George L. Bradley. His grandmother, Mrs. Bradley, is still living and very wealthy. Some day the combined fortunes will be his. Is it hard to guess whether this youth will be made welcome in society this winter?

Mrs. McKim and Mrs. Martin in Hobbles

Mrs. Smith Hollis McKim, temporarily of Reno, who spent last week at the St. Francis is as tall as Mrs. Peter Martin, which means that she is a bit taller than Mrs. Joseph Sadoc Tobin and towers above most California women who are in truth inclined to be dumpy. At any rate they appear so in the presence of such long slender grace as Mrs. McKim's. I have seen no more successful management of the hobble skirt than hers. One afternoon during her stay she glided down the peacock alley of the Palace in a long trailing thing of a queer indiscriminate color like old port. The skirt was caught in about the ankles in thick folds that would have completely demoralized a novice who attempted to move in them, but in some mysterious manner Mrs. McKim achieved both motion and grace. She wore a broad brimmed hat of the same dull wine tint and a velvet coat to her knees and was easily the most striking figure in sight. Mrs. Martin produces a very good imitation of unconscious ease in her hobble garments. She entered one of the after-the-theater cafes for supper recently bound up in one of them and in a sinuous mermaid mode of perambulation reached her table. It is when the short women try to glide sinuously that the full horror of the hobble is borne in upon one.

A Youthful Attachment

Always on the lookout to hail an incipient attachment the bavardes have pencilled in their tablets that young Mayo Newhall is paying a great deal of attention during these lively days at Santa Barbara to Miss Isabel McLaughlin, the step-daughter of Dr. McEnery, the amateur walker. And yet Mayo Newhall is only seventeen years of age! It will be seen that a scion of wealth is never too boyish to excite sentimental suspicions. It will be plenty of time for the bavardes to think about marrying off this young man when he graduates from the college in Philadelphia to which he is soon to return. Meanwhile he is having the time of his life at Santa Barbara and Miss McLaughlin receives the greater part of his attention which until recently was directed to his books and recreations to the exclusion of young ladies.

About Miss Cadwalader

Everybody who loves a lover, and that includes all the world of our exclusive society, is wondering whether the marriage of Miss Mary Josselyn to Mr. Ettore Avenali is to be followed by the announcement of the engagement of the groom's brother to Miss Linda Cadwalader. Miss Josselyn's wedding will probably take place in October in the beautiful Josselyn home at Woodside. It may be that the other engagement will be announced before that time. Certainly the young Italian is very devoted to Miss Cadwalader. Miss

Josselyn and Miss Cadwalader are inseparable pals and the two brothers are very much in their society. The quartet in fact is rarely broken, unless one or another is out of town. It is beginning to be noticed that when Miss Cadwalader returns from a week-end trip her Italian admirer is always at the depot to meet her and that during her presence in town he is ever at her side. As the sweet malady of love is known to be contagious, it is naturally inferred that one brother has caught it from the other and that Miss Cadwalader has absorbed it from her chum. I presume that a certain blind divinity has done the rest. At any rate it will merely in its infancy at the present time. Obviously it can be elaborated to an interminable extent, the only limit being the number of relations possessed by the bride-elect.

A Very Eligible Youngster

The attention of managing mamas would be respectfully called to a very eligible young man who has recently come into our midst, were it not for one fact—the managing mamas have their eagle eyes upon him already. The youngster to whom I refer is Bradley Wallace who came down from Tahoe at the beginning of the week to join his mother Mrs. Ryland B. Wallace. Young Wallace has just graduated with high honors from Harvard and is about to hang out his shingle in this city. He is a fine specimen of a sturdy Californian who is expected to follow in be interesting to await developments. Miss Cadwalader is a young woman of unusual intellectual attainments. She has had the advantage of extensive travel and is a fluent linguist, speaking among others the native tongue of Mr. Avenali. Since the death of her mother she has made her home either with her brother George or with her aunt, Mrs. Mayo Newhall.

Piazza Gossip

A number of recent engagement rumors have failed of realization, greatly to the disappointment of match-making matrons who meet on the piazzas of Del Monte, the Potter and Tahoe Tavern to discuss the young people. There was the rumor that Miss Eliza McMullin might soon announce her betrothal to John Gallois. She didn't and instead this very dainty and fascinating little maid is going East for an extended visit with relatives which would seem to indicate that no announcement is imminent. Another bit of summer gossip had it that Miss Helen Dean was engaged to a prominent young bachelor now on his ranch in Siskiyou County where she would visit his sister. Miss Dean is still with her parents at the Fairmont and no engagement has yet been acknowledged. Still persisting, however, is a third interesting rumor which declares that Miss Dorothy Van Sicklen, one of last winter's debutantes, will become the bride of the young bachelor who has been conspicuously devoted for some time. The Van Sicklens are spending the summer at Lake Tahoe and there Miss Dorothy's admirer passed a month, returning last week from a happy visit. This particular romance dates from the "Professor Napoleon" production in which the two young people were members of the same group. A second "Napoleon" romance is said to be that of the cleverest of the debutantes last year and a talented young musician who recently went abroad to study; but this may not reach the engagement stage for several years although the young man is determined to win fame and fortune and a bride in the end.

They Are Twenty-first Cousins

Miss Anita Orena whose engagement to Wilson Dibblee has just been announced in Santa Barbara is the sister of Arturo Orena, the gallant don who married Miss Caroline Redmond, grand-niece of the late General Shafter and cousin of Mrs. McKittrick. Arturo is a picturesque figure familiar to visitors in Santa Barbara who are given daily opportunity to admire his horsemanship on the beach. The family was prominently identified with California's Spanish history and at one time owned thousands of acres in the South. On some of the old Orena land the city of Los Angeles is built. Young Dibblee whose mother is a De La Guerra is well known in society here. He is a cousin of the Ross Valley Dibblees and one of his sisters is Mrs. Fred Poett of San Mateo while another is Mrs. Frank Underhill. The lithe and graceful Ynez Dibblee whose dancing was one of the sensations of last season is a third. The De La Guerra and Orena families intermarried many years ago so Mr. Dibblee and his fiancée are probably twenty-first cousins or thereabouts.

Beautiful Gladys Jones

One of the surprises of the week was the announcement of the engagement of pretty dark-eyed Gladys Jones of San Rafael to Lieutenant Owen Bartlett, U. S. N. Most of Miss Jones' friends thought that she would wed outside the service; hence the surprise. Miss Jones belongs to a little coterie of San Rafael exclusives and is the belle of the set. Witty, petite and unusually accomplished Miss Jones has had an adoring following since her early teens when the Hitchcock and Tamalpais cadets began to neglect their lessons for the privilege of worshipping at her shrine. She is the second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Hugh R. Jones, her father being the well known lumberman while her mother is a member of one of our oldest and most exclusive families. Mrs. Jones was May Boswell, the daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Boswell. Her sister Edith married Fritz King, the son of Thomas Starr King. They all belonged to what was known as the Bush street set which numbered some of the most stunning girls in society, including Helen Landers, now Mrs. Fred Tallant, Annie Bradley, now Mrs. Ryland Wallace, Bessie Hooker, now Mrs. George Lent and several others. Edith Jones, a sister of Gladys, is also noted for her beauty and vivacity. An elder brother Bevan and two younger children complete an interesting family which has resided for many years in San Rafael where they entertain extensively. Miss Jones has been East for the past year visiting relatives. No date has yet been set for the wedding.

The Identity of the Table Dancer

A feminine correspondent whose chirography suggests primness of thought and conduct has just written me a very curious letter. Miss or Mrs. Anonyma, whichever it is, wants to know why I do not publish the name of the young woman who danced on the supper table at a recent festive gathering at Santa Barbara. As the letter contained neither name nor address I can only reply to it through these columns. For the life of me I cannot see what good purpose would be subserved if I should herald that young lady's name to the world. Although a person of too exuberant vivacity at times she is really a very estimable member of society and her prank is no concern of the polloi. I happen to know that she has suffered severe mental pain since her gay behavior was mentioned in the papers and I think that is punishment enough for a thoughtless act. To name her would be to inflict irreparable damage upon her reputation. Why not let the incident pass into forgetfulness? Whenever there is a gathering of high-spirited young people with unlimited leisure and money, such as that at Santa Barbara, it is inevitable that a few should overstep the bounds of propriety. The air of Santa Barbara is like champagne to some mercurial temperaments and as they breathe it they become negligent of conventionality. But they mean no harm and do none. So why not let them alone? So my dear Miss (or Mrs.) Anonyma, you must really pardon me for not gratifying your curiosity.

Tips for Week-Enders

When invited for a week-end, appear upon the scene early Wednesday morning, and leave late the following Tuesday evening. "Week-end" is a mere phrase, copied from England.

Use your host's best saddle-horse, insist on running his car, play tennis only with his pet racquet, break several of his favorite golf clubs, let your bull-pup uproot the prettiest flower beds, and on no account write a letter of thanks after your departure. You were asked to consider yourself one of the family, and there is no reason why you should not do so.

You do not have to like all your fellow-guests, as you did not select them. It is a waste of time to bandy politeness on persons you care nothing about. To have peace, ignore them completely, or show them from the beginning that they need expect neither sympathy nor attention from you.

Never do what the crowd does, or your individuality will be lost. To be regarded as an original, and to become really popular, you must always object to the plans of your hosts, and suggest instead amusements which appeal alone to you.

Do not appear in evening clothes, if the others do; really fashionable persons wear anything they like at any time or place.

When the conversation touches upon topics which you know nothing about, interrupt frequently with jocose remarks and then, by an adroit phrase or two, divert the talk to those themes upon which you are able to descant indefinitely and inanely.

Always point out faults in the construction of your friends' place and tell them without reserve what they ought to do to improve it, and how you intend to lay out and arrange your own country house as soon as you get one.

If you get no invitations at all, after following these rules, set down the omission to the hoorishness, stinginess, jealousy, and rudeness of persons who are your inferiors both in birth and in breeding.

Mrs. Astor's Photograph

In the show window of a well known New York photographer in Fifth avenue there is on display a rarely beautiful photograph of Mrs. Ava Astor and next to it is a photograph of one of Mr. Jack Astor's fair companions who is said to have been the cause of the trouble in the Astor household. Despite the juxtaposition this woman is not of Mrs. Astor's world. Naturally the two pictures placed in such significant relation are attracting a great deal of attention. A large crowd stands constantly in front of the show window examining the lineaments of the proud Philadelphia woman of high breeding and the full-blown beauty beside her. The comments are usually far from complimentary to Jack Astor and the photographer is warmly censured for his display of bad taste. I wonder if any of my readers remember the time that one of our own photographers resorted to the same expedient to attract the attention of the passers-by? The woman concerned in the local instance was almost as prominent in this city as Mrs. Astor is in New York.

It Will Be a Gay Night

Tonight (Saturday) the Greeters' Club gives its first annual ball at the Auditorium. The Greeters' Club is an association of local hotel clerks and every man in the order knows who's who and what's what. The Greeters have some very original ideas about entertaining and the ball tonight will embody quite a number of them. It is not going to be quite as formal as Mr. Greenway's birthday party nor quite as informal as a Bal Tabarin, but there will be enough zest infused into the function to fillip the most jaded taste. Beauty will smile her most fascinating smile, gallantry will outdo itself in beauty's cause and prudery will be a quality forgotten. Decidedly this ball will be worth attending.

In the Social Spotlight

The month of July was the greatest month that Mr. Fred Swanton, the manager of the Casino and Cottage City at Santa Cruz ever had. By actual figures he took care of 5,899 guests in the Cottage City during July. The gross and net profits for the month broke all records. There are a great many interior people arriving daily and August is going to be a gala month too.

An art exhibition was given at Carmel on Friday and Saturday of last week by Mrs. Alice Best and Mrs. Maud Arndt. Mrs. Best's work in oil and pastel is well known and the work of Mrs. Arndt in artistic jewelry and water colors is exquisite. The exhibition was so successful that the two artists have decided to have a permanent studio at Carmel. The ladies were the guests of Mrs. Charles F. Fleming.

Mrs. Kate Merrill, formerly of Little Rock, Arkansas, surprised her many friends last week by being quietly married in Oakland to Mr. James N. Bassity, manager of a mercantile company in this city. After touring the southern part of the State they will return to make their home here.

Mrs. E. T. Tenny, one of the socially prominent women of Honolulu who has joined the Honolulu colony at the Fairmont, was hostess Thursday evening at a beautifully appointed dinner, having as her guests Captain William Matson and Mrs. Matson, Miss Lurline Matson, Emile Kehrlein and Vernon Tenny. Mrs. Tenny has taken apartments for the winter and will entertain on an elaborate scale during her stay at the Fairmont, returning to her island home some time in February.

One of the recent delightful teas at the Palace was that of last Saturday when Mrs. J. Wilson Shields was hostess to less than a dozen friends. The tea table was set among the palms in the court and was decked with pink roses and ferns, making a very pretty picture.

Mrs. Florence Porter Pfingst returned home from the Orient on the Tenyo Maru and is again occupying her apartments at the Fairmont. She was met at the pier by her mother, Mrs. J. F. Porter and her brother, the lieutenant-governor. They will remain at the Fairmont for several weeks.

Ensign and Mrs. S. A. Clement of Mare Island spent several days in town during the week, stopping at the Fairmont where they received their many friends in the service set.

Judge Rufus B. Smith of Cincinnati, Mrs. Smith and Miss Smith have taken apartments at the Fairmont.

Tevis Blanding who has entertained his friends on a lavish scale since his recent return from Europe, is stopping in the Blanding apartments at the Fairmont, although his family is still at Belvedere.

The annual golf tournament which will be held at Del Monte from August 19 to August 31 is naturally attracting the attention of the enthusiastic devotees of the game. Golfers are hurrying home from all over the country to try conclusions on the links for which the hotel is famous. Mr. Summer P. Hunt, Los Angeles Country Club, Mr. C. B. Tufts, Annandale Golf Club, Pasadena, Mr. Percy W. Selby, Burlingame Country Club, Mr. W. F. Garby, Claremont Country Club and Mr. Vincent Whitney, San Francisco Golf and Country Club are the committee of arrangements.

Among those who have already registered at Del Monte for the tournament are the Vincent Whitneys, the Parker Whitneys, W. A. McEnery, Miss Teresa McEnery, Miss McLaughlin, Mr. H. Gordon Pattee of Riverside, who took part in the tournament last year, Mrs. Walter Martin, Mrs. Laurence Irving Scott, Miss Florence Ives, Miss Alice Hager who won the women's championship in 1909, Mrs. M. A. Shields, Mrs. W. H. Postlethwaite, Mrs. George Field and John Rogers Clark.

Mr. and Mrs. J. C. White of Marysville are stopping at the Hotel Von Dorn. Mr. White is a prominent merchant of the Sacramento Valley.

Nat Ellery, republican candidate for Governor, and Mrs. Ellery were guests at the Hotel Von Dorn for several days this week.

Among those prominent socially who are spending the winter at the Hotel Von Dorn is Mrs. H. R. Van DeBoe, wife of Lieutenant Van DeBoe of the U. S. S. California.

Recent arrivals at the Hotel Victoria include: Mrs. B. de Balan, London; Mrs. F. Finnell and son, Hongkong; Mr. W. L. McLaine, Fresno; Mrs. L. P. Swift, Miss Laura Swift, Miss Gertrude Swift, Fresno.

Gen. D. Gordon, U. S. A., retired, Mrs. Gordon and their daughter Mrs. C. G. Upham have taken apartments for the winter at the Victoria.

Saturday night the Misses Garneau of St. Louis entertained twelve of their friends at a farewell dinner in the private dining room of the Victoria.

During the absence of Commander Victor Blue, U. S. N., Mrs. Blue and her son will reside at the Victoria.

Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Garneau and the Misses Garneau of St. Louis who have been at the Victoria for the past month left Sunday night for a stay of a month at Castle Crag.

From August 13 to 19 Santa Barbara will be the cynosure of all yachting eyes on the Pacific Coast, and of the golf enthusiasts as well. Plans have been made and are now being put in action for both the regatta and the golf tournament which, although they overlap slightly on each other's time, will not conflict to any noticeable degree. The race from San Pedro to this port will mark an exciting opening to what will be the largest regatta ever held on the Pacific Coast. Over twenty boats have made entry already and at least ten more are expected. This will offer ample material for all races and each event

The Moorish banquet room of the Hotel Potter at Santa Barbara was the scene on Saturday evening, August 6, of one of the most elaborate dinner parties given during the present season, Mr. and Mrs. Milo M. Potter being the hosts and Mrs. Andrew Welch of San Francisco the guest of honor. The round dining table was decorated with pink-shaded candelabra, and a wealth of pink carnations, Amaryllis lilies and asparagus fern. Round the room were placed at intervals potted plants and lanterns on Oriental tabourettes. The guests present were Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Welch, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Solano, Mr. and Mrs. Fowler, Dr. and Mrs. Jarvis Barlow, Dr. and Mrs. Guy Cochran, Mrs. W. M. Newhall, Mr. and Mrs. James Slauson, Mrs. W. S. Porter, Mrs. Henry Clarence Breeden, Mrs. C. C. Mrs. Peter Cook came up from her country home and spent last week-end at the Palace where she entertained her niece, Miss Eva Marty, and her sister, Mrs. George McNear, previous to Miss Marty's departure for an extended trip abroad.

Mrs. T. J. Field, the handsome wife of the well known and popular banker of Monterey, accompanied by Miss Marian A. Field, her daughter, are spending a week or two at the Palace. Later they will be joined by Mr. Field and the trio will probably motor down to Santa Barbara.

Capt. and Mrs. E. P. Tompkinson of Los Angeles are spending a short time at the Fairmont.

My Flora is a canny Scot—
Too canny, truth to tell—
For though I'd have her share my lot,
She'll no commit herself.

I said: "Will you my sweetheart be?"
She answered: "Hoots! You men!"
I pressed her: "Do you care for me?"
She said: "I dinna ken."

"What! Don't you know your mind?" I cried.
She said: "It's a warm the day."
I asked her: "Will you be my bride?"
She said: "I couldna say."

"Come, lassie, shall it be next spring?"
She cried: "You're verra free."
"Then tell me, may I buy the ring?"
"Man! Please yourself," says she.

Before the chancel steps we stood
St. Giles' Kirk intil;
The parson asked me if I would:
Of course I said "I will."

But when it came to Flo's reply,
The nearest that she'd go,
Was just to murmur cautiously,
"I wouldna say I'll no."

"Such a Little Queen" at Ye Liberty

A very dainty play, and sympathetically acted, is Channing Pollock's "Such a Little Queen" which has been given during the week at Ye Liberty Playhouse in Oakland. It is not often that Oakland scores on San Francisco in the matter of presenting a new play that is hot from its eastern success. If it does not reach us by way of the Columbia or some other theater with syndicate connections, the wide awake Alcazar people usually seize it with avidity. But here is a drama which was one of New York's distinguished successes during the past season, so great a success that it requires no particular effort to remember that it made Miss Elsie Ferguson a very popular star. And yet we must look to Oakland for its western premiere. Decidedly Harry Bishop is entitled to congratulations for his enterprise. But even the most enterprising of managers could not go far without a capable company and the success of "Such a Little Queen" would have been naught were the members of the stock company across the bay less capable than they are. With Mr. Sydney Ayres and Miss Izetta Jewel as leading man and leading woman the cast contains several names favorably known to San Franciscans. It is only necessary to mention Henry Shumer, George Webster and Walter Whipple to show that one is among old friends. Readers of the magazines have no doubt breathed the Ruritanian atmosphere of "Such a Little Queen." A war cloud in the Balkans, that perpetual bug-bear of European diplomacy, makes the background of the picture but the royalties concerned are presented to us, not in their native principalities, but in New York whither they have fled to save their royal necks at the expense of many royal prejudices. In the uncongenial city of exile the king of Bosnia and the queen of Herzegovina learn that self-sacrifice and common suffering form a splendid basis for real affection and when the inevitable summons to their deserted thrones comes as the climax of the third act they face the prospect of a real marriage instead of an "alliance" dictated by geographical considerations. It is a prettily conceived story that warms the heart and braces one's faith in human nature without too much suspicion of moralizing. It seems too bad that Mr. Ayres, Miss Jewel and their capable support are presenting it for one week only. San Franciscans do not often cross the bay for theatrical entertainment, but they would be more than repaid for their pains if they commuted for the sake of witnessing "Such a Little Queen." Let us hope that Mr. Bishop will revive it.

"Il Trovatore" at Idora Park

When Verdi composed "Il Trovatore" he united a story of romantic fascination to music that almost sings itself. It is small wonder that the opera should have acquired and retained so great a popularity. It is also not to be marveled at that it should be a favorite with opera companies not too highly endowed in the matter of voices. It is well nigh impossible to make a failure with "Il Trovatore." Last week the Bevani Grand Opera Company sang "Il Trovatore" at Idora Park. The Bevanis did not have to rely on the inherent power of the opera to take care of itself, for they are an aggregation of pleasing singers and they gave it with a great deal of spirit. The Leonora of the cast was Guiditta Francini whose soprano is of a sweet and pleasing quality and whose personal charm is greater than that of some whom we have seen in the role. Of course Azucena is the most interesting role in "Il Trovatore" and it was a distinct surprise as well as a pleasure to find that our old friend Bernice Holmes, well remembered by the patrons of the Tivoli, was sustaining the part. Miss Holmes has not a great contralto, but she has a contralto which gives continual satisfaction to the ear while her acting is much more spirited than that of the majority of grand opera singers in these Verdi roles. Miss Holmes sang Azucena in English with a clear enunciation and received the compliment of considerable applause. The Manrico was Eugenio Battain and he availed himself several times of a tenor's privilege to sing off the key. The Count di Luna of Ettore Campana was unusually good and he was compelled to repeat the "Il Balen del Suo." The Ferrando of Alexander Bevani, the Inez of Estella Burgess and the Ruiz of M. Michielli were all greeted with approval. It is needless to say that the enthusiastic audience could not get enough of the Gypsy Chorus. It would be a sorry "Il Trovatore" audience which could.

Hackett in Two Favorite Roles

In response to popular demand the Alcazar management has decided to revive during the coming week "Monsieur Beaucaire" and "The Prisoner of Zenda," the plays in which James K. Hackett has scored his most pronounced successes. "Monsieur Beaucaire" will hold the boards Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings, with a special matinee Thursday, and "The Prisoner of Zenda" will round out the week, with the usual Saturday and Sunday afternoon performance. These will positively be the last presentations of these plays by Mr. Hackett in San Francisco. There will be no change in the cast of either play.

"Seven Days" at the Columbia

In "Seven Days" part of the fun comes from the allotment of housework to a dinner party of fashionable folk who are quarantined in a Riverside Drive house. It is useless to attempt to narrate the play. "To describe 'Seven Days,'" declared Channing Pollock, "is as difficult as to describe the sensation of being tickled in the ribs." It will be seen at the Columbia commencing Monday evening, August 15, when Messrs. Wagenhals and Kemper will present it with a talented New York cast and a marvelous scenic equipment. The cast includes Aubrie Beatty, Ned Finley, Ben Wilson, Hugh Cameron, William

Miss Jewel as Sapho at Ye Liberty

Miss Izetta Jewel's special engagement with the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, has proved so popular that Manager Bishop announces already that he has arranged with her to extend her season an additional week. On next Monday evening she will be presented as Daudet's French heroine, "Sapho." This play has never before been given at Ye Liberty and as it is generally conceded to be the best of all the French emotional dramas its appearance there is certain to be an interesting event. And there will also be a keen interest taken in Miss Jewel's interpretation of the character, for it is one with which nearly every play-goer is more or less familiar and one which allows of many varying interpretations. Sydney Ayres will be the Jean Gaussin and all the other favorites of the company will be seen in the long cast. After one week of "Sapho" Ade's "College Widow" will be given.

Good Vaudeville at the Orpheum

The Operatic Festival is the title of the headline attraction for next week at the Orpheum. Two beautiful stage settings, "Gypsy Life" and "The Carnival of Venice" are used and the cast includes fifteen soloists who give grand opera numbers. The repertoire includes selections from "The Bohemian Girl," "Il Trovatore," "Lucia," "Rigoletto," "Martha" and other favorite operas.

EULA BRUNELLI

a violin solo by Madame Brunnelle. J. C. gent, the well-known comedian assisted by York, will present a sketch of which he is author called "The Squarer." Edward Flann and Neely Edwards, in their version of life "On and Off," expect to capture the phum audiences. The Harvey-De Vora Trio a dancing review will be an enjoyable feature the new bill. Bert Harvey is the originator all the steps used in the act. Miss De Vora an eccentric toe dancer and little John Dough, other member of the trio, is the smallest median on the vaudeville stage. An attraction ich is sure to be popular is a series of motion tures showing the meeting of the Grand Lodge Elks recently at Detroit. Next week will be last of Gus Sohlke's "Toy Shop Pastimes," pp, Mehlinger and King, Lou Anger and the amatic playlet, "The Police Inspector."

Aida at Idora

With the Navassars, the greatest girl's band in country, giving free concerts every afternoon l evening in the bandshell and Bevani's Opera mpany in the theater, Idora Park is offering a riet of attractive entertainment. For next ek, beginning with a matinee on Sunday, the vani company will sing "Aida." The company as been increased to eighty voices. Aida will sung by Guiditta Francini and Regina Vie- no. Margaret Jarmen, a new contralto, will ernate with Edmee de Dreux in the role of nneris. Campana and Alberti will have the rt of Amonasro. Radames will be sung by ttain and Sacchetti. Bevani will be Ramphis, ile Florian will sing the King of Egypt.

Bourget's Sensational Play

A new play by Paul Bourget called "Un Cas de Conscience" has created quite a sensation in Paris where it is being presented at the Comedie-Francaise. The story is certainly unusual. It tells of a young doctor who is sent down by the famous professor Trousseau to a patient in the country, and unexpectedly finds himself in presence of a moral difficulty out of which he is helped by his professional instinct, but not with- out a struggle. The patient is one M. de Roc- queville, a retired naval officer, who is at the mo- ment going through a dangerous and possibly a mortal stage of uremia. (Needless to say M. Bourget leaves the narration to his doctor, and we are treated to a copious display of technical- ities.) The village doctor, who attends the count when his distinguished junior arrives from Paris, tells the latter that his patient has become worse quite suddenly, and he can only think of some mental cause for this turn of the illness. What it is he does not know for a certainty, but everybody in the countryside knows that the countess had a very dear friend years ago, and perhaps her husband has just found out about him. Some such discovery would account for his evident excitement and his rapid sinking. In fact, the young doctor soon notices that the countess is anxious and worried by something else than her husband's condition, and, on the other hand, he suspects that there must be some tragic reason for the secrecy which M. de Roc- queville enjoins upon him while dictating to him telegrams to his sons. Soon after chance gives him the key to the riddle. He overhears a con- versation between the count and countess which leaves no doubt that the latter did have a lover once, that one of her children is his, that the count has found it out by a half-burnt letter, and he fiercely insists on knowing the name of the illegitimate son, threatening, if the countess refuses, to disgrace her before her sons and then die. Just at that moment the terrible excitement in which this scene has thrown the patient brings on a fit; servants rush in, and the doctor is called. He sees at once that the count is at death's door. Almost instinctively he applies a remedy which seems to take no effect, but, while he does so, the case appears to him in its torturing absurdity. There is one other remedy which he knows will succeed: if the patient is bled he will not re- cover certainly, but he will probably come to in a short time and survive two or three more days—that is to say, long enough to do what he has threatened and ruin the lives of four people. After a struggle, which lasts only a few minutes but seems to last an age, the professional instinct gets the better of everything else, the patient is bled, and the awful scene takes place.

The Drama

(From the Bronson, Minn., Budget)

This sterling melodrama will be at the Bron- son Opera House Saturday evening, June 4. The play is in five acts, and is manly, quick in action, strong in plot, and is alike humorous and pathetic. There is in it the odor of new-mown hay and the flavor of country lanes. Red-blooded manhood walks upright with its homespun heart, and love steals in at twilight as quiet as the even- ing stars. The lesson taught is, "As ye sow, so shall we also reap," and it settles upon one like a gentle hand upon the weary head and whispers, soft as a mother's kiss, "Go to sleep, the morn will be bright."

A Clipper

There was once a playwright who sat in the front row at the first night of a new piece of his own. This piece failed. It failed dreadfully. As the playwright sat, pale and sad, amid the hisses, a woman behind him leaned forward and said:

"Excuse me, sir, but, knowing you to be the author of this play, I took the liberty, at the beginning of the performance, of snipping off a lock of your hair. Allow me now to return it to you."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—A further improvement in securities occurred in the recent week and the moderate rise seems logical at this period in view of a partial dissipating of the wide pessimism on the crop outlook. Much needed rain has fallen during the past week in the dry districts. While there are temporary factors that can work for slightly better prices in stocks, the more important element in the Wall street situation that will bear watching closely is money. With the crop-moving season soon to be in full swing the large accumulation of bank reserves will be quickly depleted and the usual fall stringency in funds will be seen. This will not be a bull card on stocks; on the contrary it will undoubtedly create another period of low prices.

Wheat—Last week's net result in the wheat market values illustrates with fair accuracy the present situation. The Government report of August 8 materially cleared up the world's view for the 1910 crop year. The hysterical period regarding crop losses in France was of brief duration, and its effects, of course, were more potent on values abroad than here. Advances were not nearly as great as during the late winter bulge on the discovery of Kansas losses, or the more recent bulge following the crop losses in the northwest. Nevertheless the combination of losses the world over has trimmed the crop down to more nearly normal proportions in regard to prospective demand. It appears now that, counting the carryover of the previous crop, the world will have about the same quantity to go on that it had last year. That will be ample to leave a little better supply at the end of the year.

Corn—Although the corn market has taken cognizance during the last week of the crop improvement, the result of cooler weather and timely rains, it was not considered likely that this would be shown in the Government report of August 8. The Government figures were made up as of August 1, at which time the crop losses in Oklahoma, Kansas and Nebraska were greatest and when the dry weather also had aroused much uneasiness in regard to the outlook in the big States east of the Missouri River. The recent rains had come at a critical time in the life of a crop in these big producing States—the early period—and it is believed that danger of a corn crop failure has passed, barring of course the possibility of frost losses.

Cotton—The advance during the past week was caused by short covering in August and September and the buying of the new crop months by trade interests who are daily becoming more apprehensive over the unfavorable outlook for the crop as a whole and the Texas crop in particular. Many reports were received from most reliable and irreproachable sources telling of the insignificant character of last week's rainfall and of the enormous deterioration which is taking place in Texas on account of the drought and high temperatures. One authority says that the condition is not better than 70 per cent, while another said that the State would probably not make over 3½ million bales. Texas has been depended upon to produce a full yield before and if this State makes only about three millions and Oklahoma about 800,000 bales, it will be folly to expect the total crop of the United States to exceed 11½ million bales. This would indeed be a calamity following last year's midget crop and the staple would probably sell at a higher price than was realized during last season. Early receipts of new cotton are selling readily at around old crop quotations and as long as this state of affairs exists, there can be no danger in buying new crop futures until they advance to a basis with spot cotton in the south.

Copper—The copper market has been firm during the past week but with a diminished volume, showing an inclination to await the producers' metal report. An increase was looked for of 15,000,000 pounds and when only 2,000,000 was shown, there was activity in copper shares and a sharp advance followed. We look for this action to continue, as production is being reduced to a greater extent than is generally supposed. We advise purchases of the Lake issues. All copper shares will participate in this advance in a sympathetic manner, if not from intrinsic values.

A SOUL LAMENTS THE DECAY OF HER BODY

The moth is in my raiment.
My rose and white brocade.
Like overworn lilies
Behold it fall and fade!
(So petals fall and fade!)

As fair moth-eaten raiment,
One moment sweet and sad.
Shows frayed, unearthly beauty.
Far tenderer than it had.
(Far dreamier than it had!)

So, for some soft strange moments,
Before it is no more.
My delicate, tired splendor
Is rarer than before.
(More wistful than before!)

Ah, me! When from my raiment
The rose-white wreaths must pale,
Can I endure to wear it,
The spoiled and riven veil?
(The rent revealing veil!)

Like silver Hesper rising
Through amber-flaming cloud,
So in my bedesmaid's mantle
Shall I go pure and proud?
(I may go wise and proud.)

But, oh! Sad lips and eyelids,
And flowering fingers white,
That Love will kiss for pity,
As once for mere delight!
(Merc passionate delight!)

on the point. But that's no matter. Just this much is sure, that from that time I had no cause for complaining of her association with the two giants."

"What?" cried I, so excitedly that the window-panes rattled.

Gus went on, quite unmoved: "Never again did I meet one of them alone at Kitty's. They used to take tea with her before the performance, and I was invited sometimes, too. Since the two giants didn't know a word of French and Kitty not a word of English, I was so to say, the interpreter."

"And when you were not there," I remarked cordially, "how did they manage?"

Gus contemplated me. "In spite of your looking so infernally innocent," he answered me, with earnest mien, "I note well that you intend that question as an aspersion upon Kitty. Yet I assure you that, after that one episode, there never again arose any cause for my suspecting Kitty. At any rate, not as far as these giants were concerned. It was a—caprice; great Scotland, I, too, have my caprices! And who knows how I might have comported myself with a giantess? I assure you the Two Darlings were as mere babes; once I happened upon them when they were playing toss-ball with Kitty; the one giant stood in one corner of the room, the other in the other—or vice versa; I never was able to tell the one from the other." Gus smiled somewhat weakly in recalling that merry scene.

Suddenly his countenance darkened, and he went on: "Yesterday was their last appearance. At six this morning we accompanied the giants to the station, Kitty and I. There was a most unimaginable fuss at the station, especially when the two giants waved good-bye from the car window with two table napkins. I took Kitty home in a cab. I had to assuage her grief, and she was so charming that I never got to the office until noon. When I consider that that was only this very morning—and how everything has changed since then!"

"Among other things, doubtless," I remarked, with a sort of presentiment, "the program at Ronacher's."

Gus gave me the look of a dying stag. "What would you?" he said. "The public has to have a change."

I put the matter simply. "Who was it?"

"The Osmond Troupe," was Gus' answer. And Gus blushed.

"How many of them?" I asked in a depressed tone.

"Seven," answered Gus.

"Seven," I repeated, in the voice of a strong man moved to joy.

"Quit that!" he put in solemnly. "I will not conceal from you that even during the performance I had my forebodings. The Osmonds are persons of a most unthinkable agility, of a good deal of wit, and vastly musical. They did not present much that was new, but everything that they did was finer, far finer, than I had ever seen it done before. Roughly speaking, theirs were the usual stunts. They come on with a fearful noise, turn somersaults, heave a bass fiddle or so at each others' heads, pull the legs out of the tables and play the march from 'Tannhauser' on them, sit down on velvet sofas that play 'Teasing,' and so on. As I watched these fellows jumping about and doing their insane tricks, I found the seeds of jealousy sprouting in me, for I was unable to conceal from myself, after my several experiences of that sort with Kitty, that the evening was likely to add to my unpleasant memories. But suddenly I had an idea that brought me comfort, peace, yes, even a sort of satisfaction. For these were, all of them, normally built creatures, not dwarfs, not giants, just such fellows as you and I." I bowed gratefully. "In this case I was relieved of all scruples. I could beat the life out of every one of these fellows without appearing ridiculous."

"At midnight the performance came to an end. From twelve to one I went for a walk; in that hour hope awoke in me. Mistaken hope! The door was only ajar; behind it I heard whispering, laughing; I walked in, and, as you suspect, there was one of the seven."

"Probably the leader of the orchestra," said I, more or less thoughtlessly.

"How should I know?" retorted Gus. "In Ronacher's the whole lot were painted and powdered, which I cannot say of the creature I met at—that wretch's. He was, as I had expected, a good-looking young fellow, like myself." He no longer included me. "The incomprehensible Kitty looked at me and said, with a winning smile, 'Unless I am wrong in my count, this is the third time.' 'And the last, I assure you,' I said in a tone that I am sure she had never yet heard from any man. Then I turned to the Osmond, who had gone on comfortably smoking his cigarette, and—shall we say—sitting still; grabbed him by the arm, and said, 'Sir, you are a skunk, and I mean to give you a lesson! Not by any means because this sort of lady arouses jealousy in me, but simply because this sort of thing irritates me—the word is rather neat, eh, for this precise moment?' With that I put up my hand to smash him in the face. But in that exact instant I ceased to see daylight; quite literally things went black before my eyes, for the one-seventh of the Osmonds had smashed in my silk hat, and I knew nothing except the identical words that I had heard an hour before, from the stage, as he stabbed one of the other six in the head with a spade—German words in an English accent: 'Dear boy, how funny you are!' When I finally succeeded in getting my silk hat aloft again, Kitty, lovely creature, was reeling about the floor in a veritable convulsion of laughter, and the clown was sitting, as if nothing had happened, with his legs crossed on the back of the lounge, smoking his cigarette. But I felt: This is the end! There was nothing left in me; no love, no jealousy, no shame, no pride, no hate. I said: 'Good evening, Kitty!' paid no attention to the other, left the room, hung my squashed silk hat on a peg in the

The Physicians of the Murine Eye Remedy Company, Chicago, U. S. A., Oculists of years' standing, carefully prepare "The Murine Eye Remedies" in the Company's Laboratory. These Remedies are the result of their Clinical, Hospital and Private Practice, and they have found from their years of experience with Children's Eyes, that two drops of Murine in each Eye of the Growing Child is of inestimable value. Murine is an Eye Tonic and they know, if it is used regularly, that it Tones the Eye of the Growing Child and in many instances obviates the use of Glasses, and is it not reasonable that Glasses when not required will retard the development of a young and growing Eye?

Murine, through its Tonic effect, Stimulates Healthy Circulation and thus promotes the normal development of the Eye. We do not believe there is a Mother who has used Murine in her own Eyes and in the Eyes of the members of her family who would be without it, or who is not willing to speak of its Merits as The Household Friend.

The Child in the Schoolroom needs Murine. Murine contains no harmful or prohibited Drugs, and conforms to the Laws of the Country.

Druggists everywhere will supply Murine and tell you of its gratifying results.

Samples and Instructive Literature cheerfully sent by Mail to interested applicants. Murine Eye Remedy Co., Chicago, U. S. A.

hall, and put on this beautiful, new, black, stiff, round hat, which belonged to the clown, and just hurried over here quickly to tip you the wink never to get tangled up with an eccentric singer."

"My dear Gus," I said, "you are unjust. In my opinion you come out of the episode a clear winner. I say nothing of the hat, which suits you adorably, but merely of the experience you have gathered. How else could one of us manage to achieve such intimacy with dwarfs and giants?"

Gus shook his head grimly

I insisted: "And in your case I would not miss taking my tea at Kitty's, where, I have no doubt, you will make the acquaintance of the entire troupe." Gus looked at me mistrustfully. "Why certainly," I continued, "I imagine it would be quite amusing. Just as the two giants played pitch and toss with her, the Osmonds will probably be playing the piccolo for her."

"You are an idiot," retorted Gus. He never could stand having anyone else making good jokes.

The waiter stepped up. We paid, and walked out into a glorious spring morning.

"Only one thing tickles me," said Gus. "The fellow won't laugh so long over his joke when he looks into the hall, and instead of his new hat—"

Gus went suddenly silent. I noticed that his face seemed to freeze, and his eyes grew enormous in size. I followed his gaze, and saw that a young man was walking toward us, clad in complete elegance, save that his silk hat was a total ruin. Gus stood still and allowed the young man to approach. The latter lifted his hat and said:

"Good morning, sir."

"Good morning," said both of us, and took off our hats, intending, of course, to replace them at once. I succeeded. Not so my friend Gus. His hat was simply taken out of his hand by the stranger, who put it on and handed Gus the ruined stovepipe, with a polite smile. And turning to me, as if it was principally to me that his excuses were due, he remarked:

"I have, you see, by mistake taken this little hat a little hour ago at a little friend's. Good morning, sir." With which he went.

I would be a liar if I asserted I had ever seen a more stupid face than my friend Gus presented. He was pale as death and appeared to be fighting for speech or breath. He waited until the gentleman had reached a decent distance, then he said with a sort of dismal resolution: "What can one do in a case like that? Do the dagger act? Or scream with laughter?"

"Dagger," I said quickly. I gave him the advice, not from blood-thirstiness, but from curiosity, since I have never yet seen one man stab another. Whether Gus was too kind-hearted, or whether he had forgotten his dagger again—it is sure only that he did not follow my advice, but gave just one short laugh, and not even, as at first he had resolved, a screaming laugh. I looked at him with a good deal of concern, for I know people who have gone suddenly mad in similar crises. Gus did not go mad. A curious twitching crossed his features, as if a fearful excitement were suddenly emerging, and he said, in a tone that was, if anything, dreamy:

"I shall simply use the iron."

I am convinced he meant on the hat.

Here is a tale of Kitchener of Khartoum which shows that he has a caustic wit.

K. of K. and his Military Secretary were walking along the road in one of the Upper Indian cantonments, and met a certain well-known student soldier who is known as the Walrus, and who is notoriously careless in the matter of dress.

"Hullo!" said the Military Secretary, who knew everyone in India; "here comes the Walrus."

"The Walrus, is it?" said K. of K. "Well, then, I should say that his clothes have been made by the carpenter."

"What is love?" she asked.

"Love," he answered, "is a brand of insanity that makes a man call a 200-pound woman his little tootsy-wootsy."

1911 CHALMERS MOTOR CARS

WILL ARRIVE AUGUST 15th

Refined But Practically Unchanged

1909 and 1910 Good Enough

The Chalmers cars come from a factory producing quality and not quantity. THE CHALMERS PRINCIPLE is not to make as many cars as possible, but TO MAKE EACH INDIVIDUAL CAR AS GOOD AS POSSIBLE.

We regret that we were not able to furnish 1909 and 1910 models to all who wanted them, and while we fear that some were offended when told that they could not get the cars they wanted, we assure every one that it is much harder to tell a prospective buyer that he cannot have the car than it is to show him why he should have one.

It is possible that the Chalmers factory could build a sufficient number of cars to take care of every available customer, but in so doing they would, like a large number of other factories, sacrifice quality for quantity, and every car sold would not make a customer for another, as has been our experience during the past two years.

A few cars are still available for September delivery.

Auto Notes

Mr. Geo. Beleney, a retired commission merchant whose home is in Ross Valley, has just returned from a trip to Red Bluff with his family, and reports that his trip in his new seven-passenger Rambler was perfect in every way. Dr. J. F. Tapley of Marysville is in town for a few days with his Rambler. The doctor says that big wheels and tires are the right thing, as he has driven over 7,000 miles up to date without even a puncture.

More and more is Del Monte becoming a motoring rendezvous, the lovely weather, the wonderful new scenic drives, and the splendid condition of the roads forming a combination irresistibly attractive to the automobilist. Following is a partial list of the arrivals at Del Monte and the name of the car: Dr. F. F. Baylis, Premier; S. Bachman, Studebaker; H. C. Cameron, Pierce Arrow, F. Vogel, Locomobile; Wickham Havens and party, Pierce Arrow; Dan Murphy, Packard; F. L. Sawyer, Standard; H. D. West, Thomas; A. Ottinger, Stevens Duryea; D. H. MacDonnell, Locomobile.

Mr. W. J. A. Smith of East Auburn drove into town a few days ago with his Rambler. After seeing the city he started for Mendocino County on an extensive fishing trip.

According to advices just received by S. G. Chapman the Oakland car won the $1200 class event at the big Newport hill-climb. This is one of the most important of eastern climbing events and always attracts a large entry list.

According to advices received by the Pioneer Automobile Company, Fire Commissioner Rhineland Waldo (New York) and Commissioner Waldo's first deputy in Brooklyn, have just taken delivery of two 45 horsepower Briarcliff model Lozier cars for use in department work.

Ed Ladd of Stockton recently purchased a Hudson car from the Pioneer Automobile Company. Mr. Ladd made the trip from Stockton to Pacific Grove in this Hudson "20," a distance of 165 miles, and averaged a little better than twenty miles per gallon of gasoline. He had no trouble.

The Weber Lake Hotel of Truckee has just equipped its big automobile with Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread tires furnished by the Weinstock Nichols Company. This machine is used in carrying guests to various points of interest in the vicinity of the hotel and consequently has some steep and rough going to negotiate.

Because of enlarging Oakland and Hupmobile business S. G. Chapman finds it necessary to increase his facilities, and consequently has secured the store adjoining his present building which will give him a sixty foot frontage on Van Ness avenue. Sales room, shop and offices are to be completely overhauled and remodeled giving as fine accommodations as offered anywhere by the local motor car trade.

G. E. Jamison, a prominent merchant and business man of Ukiah, has just passed through town on his return from an extensive trip in his Chalmers "40." Mr. Jamison left Ukiah two weeks ago and made the trip via Sacramento and Placerville to Carson City and thence to Reno. Then he came back by Truckee to Lake Tallac and stopped for three days at the Lake Tahoe Tavern. He stated to Calvin Eib, vice-president of the Pioneer Automobile Company, that he had found the trip a most delightful one, the car giving perfect satisfaction all the way.

Al. Leonard, manager of the W. D. Newerf Rubber Co., has just been presented with an old Goodyear detachable casing which came as part of the original equipment of a 1906 Buick and which has been doing service ever since. The other day it was badly cut by a piece of broken bottle. Frank F. Lansing who owns the Buick states that the mileage made by the tire exceeds 2,750 miles and in that time it gave practically no trouble.

John D. Spreckels, one of the largest White customers on the coast and already owner of eight cars of the make, has just purchased a 1911 White Steamer from the local branch of the White Company.

H. D. McCoy, secretary of the Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co. and manager of the local branch, has been in Fresno on business in connection with the new Chanslor & Lyon branch recently established there.

SUMMONS (Divorce)

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 28,873, Department No. 10.

ELSIE FREDERICA McGLYNN, sometimes called FREDERICA McGLYNN, Plaintiff, vs. CHARLES S. McGLYNN, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Charles S. McGlynn, Defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten (10) days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful neglect; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 2nd day of April, A. D. 1910.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 8580, Department No. 10, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of LEOPOLD HESSE SCRIVENER, Deceased.

Mary Ann Scrivener, Bertha Scrivener, Alice May Curtaz, formerly Alice May Scrivener, and Emily J. Diersen, formerly Emily J. Scrivener, legatees and devisees under the terms of the last will and testament of Leopold Hesse Scrivener, deceased, having filed their petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order directing Central Trust Company of California, a corporation, the executor of the last will and testament of the above decedent to sell a certain parcel of the real estate of said decedent for the purposes and in the manner therein set forth, to which petition reference is hereby made for all the particulars of said proposed order of sale as prayed for;

It is therefore ordered by the said Court that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Superior Court on the Tuesday, the 13th of September, 1910, at 10 o'clock, in the forenoon of said day, at the Courtroom of Department No. 10, Probate, of said Superior Court, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be made directing the said executor, Central Trust Company of California, a corporation, to sell so much of the real estate of the said deceased, Leopold Hesse Scrivener, as the said Court shall judge to be necessary, or for the advantage, benefit or best interest of the estate of the above decedent and of those interested therein.

And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks in Town Talk, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

ELISABETH MILLS REID and OGDEN MILLS, Plaintiffs, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting: You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Elisabeth Mills Reid and Ogden Mills, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

First Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Bush Street with the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence easterly along said northerly line of Bush Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence northerly and at right angles to said northerly line of Bush Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence westerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course sixty-seven (67) feet and six (6) inches; running thence northerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course twenty-two (22) feet; running thence westerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course seventy (70) feet to the easterly line of Montgomery Street; and running thence southerly along said easterly line of Montgomery Street one hundred and fifty-nine (159) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement.

Second Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Bush Street, distant thereon one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches easterly from the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Bush Street with the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence easterly and along the said northerly line of Bush Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; running thence at right angles northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence at right angles westerly sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; and running thence at right angles southerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement; being a part of Fifty Vara Lot Number Two Hundred and Three (203).

Third Parcel—An undivided one-half of that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Laura Place, distant thereon one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly from the southerly line of Pine Street, and which point is also eighty-seven (87) feet and six (6) inches easterly from the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence southerly and along said easterly line of Laura Place and parallel with the easterly line of Montgomery Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches; running thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with the easterly line of Montgomery Street twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches to the easterly line of Laura Place and point of commencement; being part of Fifty Vara Lots Numbers Two Hundred and Two (202) and Two Hundred and Fifty-five (255); subject, however, to all the terms, conditions, covenants and agreements contained in that certain indenture made on the 11th day of December, 1906, by and between Exchange Realty Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of California, having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and D. O. Mills and Ogden Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid (wife of Whitelaw Reid), and recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 5th day of February, 1907, in Liber 64 of Deeds, at page 10, New Series.

Fourth Parcel—An undivided one-fourth of that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly on a perpendicular line drawn from a point on the southerly line of Pine Street one hundred and sixty-five (165) feet easterly from the easterly line of Montgomery Street, which point of commencement is also seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches easterly on a perpendicular line drawn from a point on the easterly line of Laura Place one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly from the southerly line of Pine Street; running thence southerly and parallel with Laura Place twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly and parallel with Pine Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with Laura Place twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly twenty-five (25) feet to the point of commencement; being part of Fifty Vara Lot Number Two Hundred and Two (202); subject, however, to all the terms, conditions, covenants and agreements contained in that certain indenture made on the 11th day of December, 1906, by and between Exchange Realty Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of California, having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and D. O. Mills and Ogden Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid (wife of Whitelaw Reid), and recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 5th day of February, 1907, in Liber 56 of Deeds, at page 371, New Series.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein and have such other relief as may be met in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 16th day of July, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

(Seal) By M. P. BRUTON, Deputy Clerk.

Memorandum—The first publication of this summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 23rd day of July, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff: Names, None; Addresses, None.

Chester's "Cash Intrigue"

George Randolph Chester does not paint an enchanting picture of the future of our country and no doubt his "Cash Intrigue" will come in for a share of the ridicule usually heaped on any criticism of the manners and morals of our plutocrats and politicians. But after all, is it so altogether impossible? Doubtless the French Revolution, the rise of Napoleon, the Children's Crusade, Coxey's Army and Christian Science would all have been decried if prophesied five years before they occurred, and with the knowledge possessed by the veriest tyro of the intrigues of the stock market, the manipulation of strikes and the purchasability of legislative bodies of every degree, the direful results of "The Cash Intrigue" are preposterous in quantity more than in quality. Some of the characters are drawn so closely from life that they scarcely masquerade behind their book names. The scheme of the story is the gradual acquisition of virtually all the actual money in the country by one astute old financier who, by stipulating that all his dividends shall be paid to him in coin, acquires control of the stock market, the railroads and various other industries and through them, of as many congressmen in both houses as he has use for. By turning his fortune into real money and hoarding it in private vaults, he has at his mercy every rival and everyone who has ever injured and opposed him in any way. The brain back of Henry Breed is a man of half his age, Phillip Kelvin, who originates and carries out all the schemes, his own ambition being to make himself omnipotent. Breed, having acquired a fortune under existing laws, now professes to see their iniquity and to be anxious to prevent others from doing likewise. Kelvin wants power apparently for the same reason that a child wants a loaded revolver, to play with, and he and Breed use each other each to his own end. On a larger scale, Breed does just what every stock manipulator tries to accomplish—drives his rivals from the field, ruins them and holds them at his own mercy. Both he and Kelvin are extreme examples of the type held up to American youth as personified success, Breed, nearly an octogenarian, tempering his hard-fisted greed with religious protestation, and Kelvin, of a younger generation, utterly materialistic, mind without morals. Unless we except Elsie White, a girl of the people, and young Rensselaer, who, occasionally, behind his military obsession, shows germs of humanity, the characters assembled in "The Cash Intrigue" are an unlovely lot, but, unfortunately typical. Lilian Breed, the old man's grand daughter, is selfish, animal, egotistic, heartless. Mrs. Rensselaer, her chaperon and guide, belonging to an old family with tradition and breeding, has before her only one altar at which to worship, that of social dominance. George Blagg, the half crazy socialist, the wireless operator for the "power trust," and thus in a position to have access to most of their secrets, has two passions, a fanatical desire to oppose the plutocracy and to possess the splendid Lilian, and all are so intensely egotistical and individual that they can scarcely pull together each with his mate long enough to secure the advantage desired. Kelvin and Breed between them have hatched a plot that, through the possession of all the actual money in the country they will gain control not only of its material resources but of the government itself, and then, by artful manipulation, bring about such a condition of disorder as will make the declaration of martial law and the seizure of all industries and utilities necessary, after which, the time being ripe, the republic is to be overthrown and a monarchy declared. Old Breed, now virtually insane with his money greed, and all the time expecting to be himself the imperial head of the new government, has provided himself with crown, scepter and royal robes, but instead of adhering to the program, Kelvin declares himself emperor, and the splendid Lilian immediately places herself at his side, only to be repudiated. He will reign alone. Kelvin has back of him the "government," such as it is and the enormous standing army which has been increased by the enlistment of as many of the unemployed as have seen no other opportunity to gain a livelihood. Blagg has at his heels a large contingent of the chronic malcontents and cranks now reinforced by honest working folks driven to despair. Instead of the satisfaction one would naturally expect the Socialists to display now that their ideal of government ownership of everything has been brought about, with government employment and government pay in labor checks for everybody, they are as disgruntled as before because the end was not attained in their own way. Moreover, despite their avowed repudiation of money as a value in itself, they are as eager to come into possession of Breed's billion and a half as Kelvin and his cabinet. Civil war breaks out at once. The precipitating factor in the clash is Lilian Breed who, set aside without ceremony by Kelvin, places herself at the head of Blagg's faction, and leads the march to Forest Lakes and the secret vaults, intent only on two things, to triumph over Kelvin and to see herself in a place of dominance. It is precisely the position one would expect some of the scions of our "best" society to assume in such a crisis. Unlike the aristocrats of the French Reign of Terror, they have no traditions to maintain, and the mad, scrambling pushing, "me first" of their whole lives fits them best to act as leaders of the mob. All this while there has been a conservative third class, suburban dwellers and agriculturists who have been less affected than capitalists and tradesfolk by the antics of those in power, and Rollins, vice-president under Kelvin, who has refused to go the whole length of his chain and accept the new dispensation, organizes them into another army which, opposed to both the government and the mob, saves the country, though at the cost of bloodshed in which the conspirators are all either killed or taken prisoners. It would be an agreeable reflection to be assured that in the event of such a collision as Mr. Chester has set forth, a considerable number of men provided with weapons, the knowledge of how to use them, the discipline that would enable them to join ranks at a moment's notice, and the will to submit themselves at once to a self-constituted leader would be ready at hand, but, unfortunately the twentieth century youth has neither tradition nor experience in the elementary obedience of a soldier, and the love of excitement and the chance for irresponsible mischief would be far more likely to ally them with the mob. There is no occasion to work up as much of an excitement over the romance as has been caused by the as yet purely imaginary danger of an Oriental war, but for all that, the possibility is worth a thought. The Primary Election

The sovereign people of California have experimented with their new toy. We hope it has afforded them great pleasure, but we are of the opinion that it has produced in them mixed emotions. However, it was not to be expected that the direct primary would prove a source of unalloyed delight as well as of material blessings. Invented for the benefit of the people it was intended that it should put them to the inconvenience of managing their own political affairs without the aid of practical, professional politicians, the supposition being that it is to their interest to have all agencies between themselves and the government abolished. In theory the direct primary insures the realization of a beautiful political ideal. The application of the principle is another matter, as experience has demonstrated not only in this State but wherever the direct primary has been tested. For while theoretically the direct primary endues the people with the power of selecting their own servants, practically it does nothing of the kind. The choice of the people is limited to the number of aspirants for office, and the people have not the power to compel a man to enter into competition for a political job. In other words the people must make their choice out of the material at hand, and as we have seen the material in all instances is not of a very fine quality. Indeed the effect of the direct primary with its protracted, confusing and enervating scramble, its open-door for the riff-raff of politics, its tendency to make more obvious than ever the verity of the metaphor that likens politics to a cesspool, is to restrain men of fine sensibilities from entering public life. But we cannot judge accurately of the merits and demerits of the direct primary at this time. We must wait to see what kind of government it will lead to. At present among the few things we know is that the people were vouchsafed a somewhat exiguous option in the matter of quality, and for all but a few offices voted in a haphazard fashion. We also know that the spirit of insurgency is rife in California, and that the Hon. Hiram Johnson, having made broad his phylacteries was accepted by the people at his own valuation regardless of testimony more or less veracious in refutation of his claims and professions. It must be confessed that Mr. Johnson as the nominee of the Republican Party is in one sense the logical outcome of the direct primary; for there is nothing more certain than that he never could have been nominated in a boss-ridden convention. The nomination of Hiram Johnson by a convention would have been considered fatal to a whole ticket.

Democratic Presidential Timber

It is rather early at this time to speculate as to what the Democracy will do when once again in national convention assembled. We can be reasonably certain of only one thing of importance; and that is that Mr. William J. Bryan will throw no spell over the delegates. The bryaniac obsession has undergone considerable relaxation, the party has emerged from its trance, the pie-wagon brigade has abandoned hope of being fed at the hands of the perennial Peerless One, and all hands are scanning the horizon for the beaming countenance of a new prophet. Widespread and deep-rooted is the notion that the Republican party in its frantic efforts to conciliate all shades of public opinion has wandered from its ancient moorings and become hopelessly divided, and that the Democracy is privileged to take advantage of the situation with the glad assurance of a glorious triumph. It augurs well for the Democracy that the leaders in many States are evincing a disposition to give their support to men of proved administrative ability, such men as Judson Harmon of Ohio, Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey and William J. Gaynor of New York. There is nothing in common between any one of these men and the late perpetual candidate. They are hard-headed, sensible men, never inclined to drive any theory to excess, or to sacrifice their self-respect to turn a political trick. Possessed of reason calculating and calm, they are never hurried away by their passions. Not one of them is a good hater. All of them are schooled in obsolete principles of statesmanship. That the leaders of thought and of men in the Democratic party should be considering at this time the merits of men of the type we have mentioned is not without significance in view of the current persuasions of Republican statesmen. Apparently the Democratic leaders are maneuvering for the position formerly occupied by the G. O. P. They seem to think it advisable to appeal to public faith in national institutions rather than to a morbid passion for innovation. Is it possible they are figuring that by the next national campaign the people will have been surfeited with hysteria and moral spasms? Do they look for so early a return to sobriety and common sense? Are they convinced that the people are beginning to prefer a material to a spiritual awakening? If not then why are they turning cold shoulders to Joe Folk, the only conspicuous Democratic ideal of the muckrakers, a worthy disciple of Mr. Bryan, whose breath is agitation, and whose life a storm whereon he rides? Mr. Folk embodies all the salient principles of Rooseveltism, and yet, astonishing as it may seem, he appears to be making not the slightest progress toward the goal of his ambition.

The Defective Human Machine

The singular thing about accidents of the kind that occurred at Ignacio last week is that they do not occur oftener. Such accidents are the result of the common practice of placing human lives in the safe-keeping of erring man and imposing on him the impossible obligation of keeping his mental faculties incessantly alert. This practice is unavoidable because inventive genius has not kept pace with the march of civilization. Lacking automatic contrivances for self-protection in the hurly-burly of our own creation we have to depend on the merely human machine which is constantly undergoing something vastly more fatal to precision and regularity than ordinary wear and tear. Yet whenever one of the inevitable accidents occur there is widespread indignation, and the unhappy human machine is bitterly censured for having suffered himself to slip a cog. More over by a strange paradox of nature, when lives are lost as a result of absent-mindedness the human machine finds himself accused by an absurd conscience and is overwhelmed with remorse. Of course many accidents are the result of unmitigated recklessness. In such cases an example should be made of the guilty individual. An engineer who deliberately rounds a sharp curve at hazardous speed, or who takes a desperate chance to make up lost time, is guilty of recklessness. But there is a wide difference between recklessness and absent-mindedness. One is intentional, the other is among the inherent weaknesses of human nature. It is because we are all absent-minded at times that the human machine cannot command perfect confidence. Never to be absent-minded is to have the power of incessant mental concentration; and that is a power which we do not possess. If fatal accidents occurred in all moments of mental abstraction, or every time a man's mental faculties suffered momentarily the slightest derangement the human species would soon become extinct. For every individual is at times absent-minded even when alertness is more or less essential to his own security. How often have we had narrow escapes from accident that ordinary prudence should have caused us to anticipate! In these reflections we have indulged out of sympathy with the unfortunate wretch who "didn't think of the train that hadn't passed" when he gave the signal that caused the catastrophe at Ignacio.

Aldrich and Bristow

If Senator Aldrich has not satisfied the public that he has been most cruelly misrepresented by Senator Bristow he has at least induced Senator Bristow to expose himself to the contempt of intelligent men. For Senator Bristow in his reply to Senator Aldrich's letter has made it clear that the Rhode Island statesman's suspicion of his malevolence is well founded. Senator Aldrich did not accuse Senator Bristow of wilful misrepresentation. He admitted it was possible that Senator Bristow had been misinformed. Nevertheless he was rather inclined to suspect him of being a cold-blooded calumniator. He had not long to wait to have his suspicion verified. Senator Bristow charged Senator Aldrich with being interested in a rubber trust. Senator Aldrich admitted that he held stock in a company engaged in the crude rubber industry, explained that it produced a fraction of the total supply of crude rubber, that it had nothing to do with the manufacture of rubber articles, and that the price of crude rubber was fixed not in this country but in Europe. How does Senator Bristow confuse and confound Senator Aldrich? "He says he isn't interested in a rubber trust," says Bristow, "but he admits that his corporation is a holding company." In other words Senator Bristow for the purpose of supporting his accusation would have us believe that a holding company is necessarily a trust." If such be the case then thousands of men are trust magnates without being aware of the fact. Senator Bristow is a most facile controversialist. Argument according to his method requires no logical process; it is sufficient to point an inference with the aid of an untruth. How producer of crude rubber in Mexico is to benefit from a tariff on articles of manufactured rubber he does not take the trouble to explain. Nor is he decent enough to admit what he has learned to be an untruth. On the contrary to support his position he ignores the information he has received. For example though he has learned that the duty on rubber was imposed not on Senator Aldrich's motion but on the request of the New York Board of General Appraisers and the tariff experts of the Treasury Department, he continues to assume that the man whom he has maligned was alone instrumental in causing the change in the tariff. Senator Bristow is a type of the curious manhood which in any circles is believed to have been providentially called into public life for the redemption of a great nation.

Bristow the Calumniator

Senator Aldrich has probably made it clear to men of intelligence that Senator Bristow is not dominated by fine scruples. Let us not conclude that Senator Aldrich has vindicated himself at the bar of public opinion. He may be innocent of the specific accusations that have been leveled against him by the people's friend, but the incontestable fact remains that he is a regular, standpat Republican with the brand of his infamy flaming in his brow, and consequently he is beyond redemption, a fit object of universal execration, to heap calumny upon whom is a virtue which the noble is in duty bound to reward. In these perilous and piping times of political reform calumny is a weapon sanctioned by the code of civic patriotism for the benign purposes of insurgency. In the magnificent temple of reform where the odor of sanctity is diffused by that radiant high priest, Theodore Roosevelt, it is the duty of Bristow and the other sacristans to keep the altars ever adorned with fresh flowers of falsehood and slander. And according to the germinal principle of the cult it doesn't matter much what a man is at heart if he has taken the precaution to be baptized in the faith. Once soused in the magic waters of insurgency it is forever his privilege to become a kent, a pinchot, a garfield, a bristow, a redhayes, or anything else that is obnoxious to men of ordinary sensibilities.

Preachment and Practice

Notwithstanding the obvious principles of insurgency as revealed by the example of its noblest exponents there are men of intelligence wasting their time in vain and absurd efforts to bring humiliation on certain illustrious reformers who have shown a disinclination to practice what they preach. These practitioners in futility seem to have lost sight of the fact that there is more than one way of teaching morality. It should be remembered that while Arcesilaus practiced morality he preached against it, and that Aristippus gave sobriety his praise but sensuality his practice. Now the insurgents teach us what we ought to do by their precept, and what we ought not to do by their example. Take, by way of illustration, the case of Mr. Kent who teaches us the importance of conserving the national resources and at the same time fences many acres of Government land. Now while it may be all right to challenge Mr. Kent's sincerity for political purposes, it is absurd to attempt to humiliate him by questioning the consistency of his moral principles. The same is true respecting James Rudolph Garfield, a conservationist and an avowed enemy of all forms of graft. It was recalled in the recent Ohio Republican convention that a few years ago when Mr. Garfield had authority over the highways of the State he turned over an ancient canal way in Cleveland valued at $3,000,000 to the Baltimore and Ohio Railway Company for $280,000; also that it required an appeal to the Supreme Court to restrain him from putting through a similar deal in Cincinnati for the benefit of the Pennsylvania Railroad. Furthermore it was recalled that he was the author of a fifty-year franchise measure for the benefit of a traction company which was repealed by the Legislature for the benefit of the people whom Mr. Garfield so dearly loves. Now while it was shrewd of Mr. Garfield's enemies to take advantage of this record in the convention, it is absurd to believe that the record can be used to humiliate the distinguished insurgent or to abate his activity as a moralist. He is insurgent as rampantly as ever, and he will continue to insurg, and all efforts to suffuse him with blushes will be in vain. Insurgency covers a multitude of eccentricities of conduct. No sensible man possessed of a taste for knavery will neglect in these propitious times to enroll himself among the insurgents and improve each shining hour along with his own reputation by vehement denunciation on general principles of Aldrich, Cannon and Ballinger.

As to Queer Names

The man from Punxsutawney and the man from Kokomo Discussed the Chinese troubles, and the first said, "Don't you know, I think these Chinese names are queer enough to stop a clock."
"That's right," replied another man from fair Caucomgomoc.

The man from Kokomo observed, "By ginger; that's a fac'.
That's what my brother says—he lives down here in Hackensack."
And still another stranger said the man's comment was true;
And added with a smile of pride, "My home's in Kal'mazoo."

Another man took up the strain, "Now, down Skowhegan way
And up at Ypsilanti we speak it every day.
The names are all uncivilized and heathen in their ring.
That's what I told my uncle yesterday in Ishpeming."

"Hohokus is my native town," another stranger said;
"And I think all these Chinese names the worst I ever read.
"Quite true," agreed a quiet man, "they're certainly uncanny, That's what my neighbors all assert in Tail Holt, Indianny."

Perspective Impressions

Let us not forget that two men were nominated for Governor last Tuesday.

Perhaps we should love the direct primary for the hostilities it has excited and consequently the enemies it has made.

It is not that which a woman can do but that which she may do that makes her fascinating.

The voice of the people may be just what the demagogues tell us it is, but sometimes it is slightly off the key.

Now let us observe with what great enthusiasm John D. will support Rudolph's red-rubber stamp candidate for Governor.

Colonel Roosevelt was too busy in New York to send his congratulations to Hiram Johnson, so Teddy Jr. filled in for the emergency.

Mr. Roosevelt's assurance to Mr. Kent of his belief in his innocence revives recollection of the only other instance of a similar expression of a charitable feeling from the Colonel. It was in behalf of Paul Merton. And unfortunately Paul admitted his guilt.

Those familiar symbols of political faith, the ass and the elephant, seem destined for a change of ownership at an early date.

There was really only one bone of contention in the recent campaign—the jawbone.

If the muckrakers cannot convict Ballinger of wrongdoing at least they can embarrass the Administration by making it appear that the President and his advisers are really eager to get rid of him. The muckrakers will never forgive Ballinger. He defied them and therefore he must be eternally damned.

Irrigation in Mesopotamia

The great valley of Mesopotamia, the cradle of the human race, is being restored to its ancient fertility by a system of irrigation works constructed by the Ottoman government under the direction of Sir William Willcocks, an English engineer. Despite the opposition of the Arabs the lands along the Tigris and Euphrates are being safeguarded from the disastrous floods which carried sand and silt into the ancient canals and destroyed their efficiency. The Arab opposition is not due entirely to ignorance but to a well founded fear that England plans to get control of the Persian Gulf coast. Mass meetings have been held in Bagdad to denounce the project. Nevertheless the government is persisting in the projected improvements and when the plans are completed next year the old Biblical territory will begin to regain its long-lost importance as an agricultural country.

Did Sven Hedin Fake?

A scandal is convulsing all Sweden which threatens to rival the north pole fraud of Dr. Cook. August Strindberg, a dramatist and writer, has come out with a flatfooted charge that Sir Sven Hedin, the noted geographer and traveler who explored Tibet, Mesopotamia, Central Asia, Turkestan and other countries and who has written a number of books in regard to his discoveries, is a fraud and a humbug. Mr. Strindberg tries to prove by means of old maps and reports in the Royal Library that the Swedish explorer Renart discovered everything that Sven Hedin assumes to have explored as far back as 1720.

He also declares that most of Hedin's maps and tales of adventure were borrowed from Renart's works. Sven Hedin has made a reply in which he violently denounces Strindberg. He describes him as a wilful perverter of facts which are known to every school boy. The press and public have taken sides and the trouble threatens to develop into a national scandal.

The Trouble in Spain

The more the controversy between Spain and the Vatican is studied the more apparent does it become that the trouble will be settled by friendly negotiations. Spain is so intensely Catholic that there can be little hope of durable reforms unless the acquiescence of the church is assured. The cause of the trouble was the decree announcing that all forms of worship might be celebrated publicly and this affects a relatively small number of persons, for liberal ideas do not turn the Spaniard from Catholicism to other religions, but to philosophic free thought while the anarchists and socialists object to religion in any form. The great body of the people is still devoted to Catholicism. The monastic orders are the great disturbing factor. Even the Vatican authorities have admitted that they are excessive in numbers and have undue influence. Their numbers have been increased since the disbanding of the religious orders in France, although Rome did its best to divert many of them to other lands. This is a matter which the Vatican must ultimately help to settle and the Spanish government is not losing sight of this fact. The injection of the Carlist propaganda into the dispute is not alarming diplomatists, for the Carlists have always been extremely loyal to the church while their former strongholds, the Basque provinces and Catalonia are centers of socialistic and anarchistic ideas opposed equally to religion and government.

Politics in Tennessee

The recent judiciary elections in Tennessee resulted in the defeat of the regular Democrat ticket and the re-election of the Supreme Court justices who ran as independents. This is a severe blow to Governor Patterson who is a candidate to succeed himself. Governor Patterson controls the Democratic party machine. Through his influence, it is charged, the justices who refused to render a decision favorable to the Coopers, the slayers of Senator Carmack, were denied a re-nomination. Later they were placed on an independent ticket which the Republicans as well as many Democrats supported and were overwhelmingly elected. In setting Duncan Cooper free Governor Patterson usurped the judicial function, overruling the court with the statement that the murder was not proved and delivering the murderer "because he was innocent." The governor has also pardoned fifty convicted murderers yearly during the last three years and has freed 956 criminals in the same period. It is considered that he will be defeated for the governorship if, as seems likely, the independent Democrats and Republicans unite on a fusion ticket. The Tennessee State machine is one of the best organized in the country and politicians all over the South are taking a keen interest in the struggle which is now going on. Even at Beverly there is anxiety about the outcome.

A Poem on California

San Francisco, August 13, 1910.

Editor Town Talk—Dear Sir: I enclose herewith a poem which may be of interest in view of the approaching celebration by the Native Sons. It was written in San Francisco by Bayard Taylor and was read in the last lecture he delivered here on the evening before he left the State for the trip on which he died. I have not the date but have a hazy impression that it was in the early sixties. Do the Native Sons and Daughters know this poem? I doubt it.

Cordially,

—An Adopted Son.

California

O fair, young land, the youngest, fairest, far
Of which the world can boast,
Whose guardian planet, evening's silver star,
Illumes thy golden coast,
How art thou conquered, framed in all the pride
Of savage beauty still!
How brought, O panther of the splendid hide,
To know thy Master's will!
No more thou sittest on thy tawny hills
In indolent repose,
Or pourest thy crystal of a thousand rills
Down from thy house of snows.
But where the wild oats wrapped thy knees of gold
The plowman drives his share,
And where, through canyons deep thy streams are rolled,
The miner's arm is bare!
Yet, in thy lap, thus rudely rent and torn,
A nobler seed shall lie—
Mother of mighty men, thou shalt not mourn
Thy lost virginity!
Thy human children shall restore the grace
Gone with thy fallen pines;
The wild, barbaric beauty of thy face
Shall round to classic lines!

And Order, Justice, Social Law shall curb
Thy untamed energies;
And Art and Science with their dreams superb,
Replace thine ancient ease.
The marble sleeping in thy mountains now
Shall live in sculptures rare;
Thy native oak shall crown the sage's brow,
Thy bay, the poet's hair.
Thy tawny hills shall bleed their purple wine,
Thy valleys yield their oil,
And Music, with her eloquence divine,
Persuade thy sons to toil,
Till Hesper, as he turns his silver beam,
No happier land shall see,
And Earth shall find her old Arcadian dream Restored again in thee.

Questions of Veracity

Editor Town Talk—Dear Sir: I have read with a great deal of interest your comments on Senator Gore's shameful plight, and I wish to add that his conduct was worse than you have represented. I was in the East when the investigation of the Indian Land scandal was begun and I read full reports of the testimony, so probably I am in possession of more facts than were published in this city. One important point I wish to call to your attention: When Senator Gore found that Vice-President Sherman was on record as being in sympathy with the Indians and against the men who were trying to bleed them, he said that he had never believed Hamon's statement implicating Mr. Sherman. Now here are Senator Gore's exact words uttered by him when he first gave his testimony and before he knew that Sherman's record was accessible: "When Hamon named the person 'higher up' I held up my hands in astonishment and said: 'Is it possible that a person so high in the United States Government could lay himself open to such an imputation.'" So you see, Mr. Editor, that Senator Gore can be very deeply impressed by hearsay evidence. Now there is another point that I think should be made for the benefit of muckrakers. They have been quite willing to accept Hamon's statements as given on the authority of Gore so far as they implicate me who are not of the insurgent cause. Such being the case, why not accept Hamon's statement given under oath during the investigation. Not according to Hamon he was asked by Gore to finance his (Gore's) next senatorial campaign. Furthermore he swore that he and Gore were engaged together in shady land deals and "were mighty close to the danger line, but still did not violate the United States statutes." Incidentally he observed that he had known for some time that Senator Gore could be safely approached. Now perhaps Hamon was lying about Gore, but is it not possible that he was lying about others? Or, supposing that he told the truth about Gore (as is not unlikely, since as a matter of fact according to Gore himself he did "approach" the gentleman therefore justifying the presumption that he considered him safe) then may we not be skeptical with reason on the subject of Gore's self-appraisal? I submit these hints to you for what they are worth.

Election Night

A Very Extravagant Extravaganza

By Edward F. O'Day

The Time—Last Tuesday about midnight.
The Place—Party Headquarters.
The Persons—The Bunch that Usually Congregates in Such a Place at Such a Time.

Enter the Candidate for High Office. Always satisfied with himself he at present exhibits unusual gratification. With exultant eye he peruses a sheet of election returns and soliloquizes.

Candidate for High Office—

The peepul's will be done! It seems to me that only I have won a victory; that every other man upon the ticket has been defeated owing to the wicked machinations of the bad Machine that machinates and machinates till even the humblest office-seeker feels its power crushing his hope at this eleventh hour. It is as the people have elected him who bade defiance to this monster grim, turning its wiles and stamping on the pelf they tried to bribe him with—I mean myself—doesn't matter if the smaller fry has been snowed under. All the State knows I will save the State; I am a saving man with saving grace to save whate'er I can. I save my salary, save my mileage too and save my face whatever else I do. It may be, if the compensation's great, I'll save the corporations from the State.

The Candidate for Low Office rushes in. He is studying the election returns. He runs up to the Candidate for High Office with outstretched hand.

Candidate for Low Office—

Congratulate me, sir, I hear I've won; I knew the State could be depended on to choose the best man for the little place for which I've made so strenuous a race.

Candidate for High Office—

Good-bye, old man, I hate to disabuse you; the peepul though are really going to lose you. They say the office always seeks the man. Yours sought the other fellow; you also ran. Except my heartiest commiseration; I am the subject for congratulation.

Candidate for Low Office—

Oh, you be hanged! And hang the peepul too For beating me and then electing you. I used to orate, "Let the peepul rule." But now I see they only want a fool.

The Candidate for Low Office rushes out in high dudgeon. The Candidate for High Office resumes his meditation.

Candidate for High Office—

Ungrateful wretch! To speak so of the great Untrammelled act of the electorate. But, look, here comes a mighty delegation To sweeten victory with felicitation.

Enter the Chorus of Chair Warmers, a most disreputable looking crowd. They surround the Candidate for High Office and wring his hand effusively.

Chorus of Chair Warmers—

It is great, it is glorious,
The news that has come;
You're our hero victorious
And your fame we proclaim.
In Siskiyou and San Berdoos.
In Glenn and Riverside
The votes roll in, a mighty wave
That bears you on its tide.
In Santa Rosa, Mariposa,
In Trinity and Kern,
The figures mount so rapidly
They make the wires burn.
Of course we all have helped you win,
So come now, don't you think
That you can stand a little touch
To buy us all a drink?

Candidate for High Office—

It's true and yet I almost think I dream;
Take this. Go forth and purchase plenteous steam.

The Chorus of Chair Warmers disappears in the direction of the nearest saloon. The Candidate for Low Office appears again in a state of great excitement, waving a paper.

Candidate for Low Office—

A great surprise! You're very badly beat! They made an error in the tally sheet.

The vote they credited to you was mine.
Your light is out; it's now my turn to shine.
You know the office always seeks the man;
Mine sought and found me; you're an also ran.

The Candidate for High Office examines the paper, lets it drop and stalks up and down the room in great dejection.

Candidate for High Office—

I have stumped through a hundred hamlets,
I have talked till my voice is gone,
I have swilled and joshed with the great unwashed
Till my nerves are shattered and torn.
I have kissed a million babies,
I have promised a thousand jobs;
I have risked my life in useless strife
To wheedle the city mobs.
I had to strangle my conscience
To do things it wouldn't connive at;
I have roasted the Boss—in public, of course—
And fried out his fat in private.
They plastered the walls with my pictures;
They flooded the State with my cards;
They'd even importune the use of my fortune
To jockey the betting odds.
They said my election was certain;
They told me the vote I would poll;
They even pretended the contest was ended
A fortnight away from the goal.
But of course they kept spending my money
For "printing" and "postage" and such;
They bade me look cheerful when the ragged and beerful
Old bummers came round for a "touch."
I have no more money in bank;
Wifey's jewels have gone up the spout;
I mortgaged the cottage for a nice mess of pottage
And now they have counted me out!
I wouldn't mind losing the office
Though my home life and fortune are wrecked;
But the worst of it all is the wormwood and gall
Of losing my own self-respect!

The Candidate for High Office goes out to drown his sorrows in drink. The Chorus of Chair Warmers, returning for another victim, pay no attention to him. They have surrounded the Candidate for Low Office and are wringing his hand as the janitor turns out the lights.

The Kiss, a Turgenev Sketch

I was walking on a summer noon down a winding path in a wood.

The wood was trim and young, a Russian wood with intermingled kinds of trees. White-barked weeping birches were mixed with low-growing aspens, grey-green like the skin of a snake. Young oaks grew here and there in the glades and at the outskirts; elms with drooping boughs stood out in dark blotches, melancholy trees in the summer-time.

The day was clear and warm, but the sun was not seen through the thick masses of foliage, and only below on the feathery grass bright and dark circles chased and played with and melted into each other.

As I followed their fantastic play, suddenly a substantial human shadow swept forward from somewhere or other, lay over them and occupied the space before me.

I started and turned round. I was not alone in the wood.

Two paces from me a woman's figure advanced gracefully and lightly without touching the grass. She stopped. The woman drew near, and she also stood still before me. With one swift glance I managed to catch the features of a divine countenance and the contours of a marvelous body outlined through the light tissue of her waving garments. She was beautiful and young; but I did not know who she was.

Suddenly she made a movement, bent slightly over me and kissed me on the forehead.

I trembled. An indescribable emotion rose up within me, choking my breath, overpowering at once all there was of me. I stretched out my arms. I wished to prolong the feeling that coursed with a delicious tremor throughout my whole being. I lifted my head. . . . But there was no longer anyone by me.

She was going as gracefully and lightly as before, and as before she did not touch the earth. Behind her there seemed to be two wings, small and transparent. It was they which helped her to glide so lightly.

I rushed forward in her track, calling on her with a loud voice. I longed that she should kiss me on the mouth "with the kiss of her mouth."

But in vain I called and ran after her. She withdrew ever further and further.

And while I pursued her vainly I spied another man not far from me in the wood. He was a young man, almost a boy. He was walking with careless step, and his curly, beautiful head was raised slightly in the air. Gaily and carelessly the inspired eyes looked ahead, and the rosy full lips, covered faintly with down, were smiling.

I saw how the woman stopped beside him, how with a swift movement the locks that fell in disorder by his cheeks quivered and tossed themselves backward, and how she kissed him straight on the purple, parted lips. . . .

And I understood suddenly who the woman was. I understood also who was the young man.

Yes, it was she—the Muse, the inspirer of the poet. Her kiss I felt on my brow, a cold, incomplete kiss. . . .

Such a kiss, such an incomplete gift of inspiration she bestows on us, poets in prose, and treasures her kisses and caresses for him, for the careless, inspired singer of poetry.

Love and the Barometer

By Nataly Von Eschstruth (From the German)

The councilor carefully tiptoed across the heavy Smyrna rug; then, as carefully, he drew aside the portiere so that he might hear any sounds coming from his daughter's boudoir. On the features of this usually jolly and presentable widower lurked an expression of nervous tension, and as his glance took in his daughter's charming den he looked more like a poor sinner awaiting justice than the satisfied possessor of a million and a half. And the sight he had seen in the pretty boudoir had not served in the least to bring him cheer. Sybil was lounging, evidently bored, in a rococo armchair, her golden blond hair resting wearily against its back; her great violet eyes, usually sparkling with life, were now gazing sleepily into the rosy twilight. Across her shoulders and about her hands she had wrapped a white feather boa, which indicated that she was freezing despite the warm rays of the spring sun that poured through the window.

Opposite her in another chair lounged the slender, graceful figure of young Mortimer Trimmis-Seggen, the son of the councilor's youthful chum, who now represented the New York branch of his firm. Mortimer smoked a cigarette and half closed his eyes, as though the charming girl opposite him were scarcely worth a glance. Mechanically he drew across his knees the silk coverlet from the divan as though he too were shivering with cold.

"Which of your dogs received the prize in the kennel show?" asked Fraulein Mahlenstadt.

"The Scotch greyhound—first prize," answered Mortimer, suppressing a yawn.

"Ah!"

Sybil sneezed and Mortimer coughed—both were freezing in spite of the spring sun and the warm room.

Disappointed the councilor stole away, locked the salon door behind him and paced restlessly up and down his smoking-room. This was a pretty prospect for the fulfillment of his plans! Instead of lying in each other's embrace, with flushed cheeks and throbbing hearts, these two unlucky young people sat opposite each other, discussed kennel shows and froze. How in the world could an engagement result?

And yet that must be the final outcome of this affair—the councilor had sworn it to himself; for not only his daughter's happiness but his own depended on this match. He remained standing before the mirror and nervously regarded his own appearance, stroking his mustache. Six weeks ago he had worn an imposing full beard, which had fallen prey to the barber's shears just because the most fascinating of widows had confided to him: "I don't like full beards! Without it you would look ten years younger!"

When she again saw him his beard had been shaved off, and he looked more youthful by at least a decade. She blushed like a schoolgirl at the sight of him, while he fervently pressed her hand to his lips. Before he knew what he was doing he was sitting at her side, holding her hand; and the usually unapproachable widow was modestly returning his clasp. No youth ever pressed his suit with greater ardor than did Mahlenstadt; and Mary nervously fingered the pearls strung on her long golden chain that terminated in a chatelaine. Her eyelashes drooped and she breathed deeply as though this were the first time in her life that she had listened to a man's confession of love. And when he had ceased to speak and was anxiously looking into her eyes, awaiting some sign of consent, she did not return his gaze, but stared dreamily and thoughtfully at the flowers that he had brought her.

"Mary! Does it take you so long to make up your mind whether or not to accept me?"

Her fingers closed about his hands and as her glance rested on his face she whispered: "Since you seem to be carried away by your impetuosity, I must reason for both of us. My better judgment tells me that a second marriage is a luxury and a reckless undertaking for a woman—but my better judgment capitulates to your pleading, and my heart is made prisoner by your love! But wait—don't rejoice too soon, mon ami. I do not surrender without conditions. Will you swear to grant me everything I ask? Very well—then listen: You are the father of a young, beautiful, spoiled, headstrong daughter who up to this time has been mistress in your house. I too am young, spoiled—and I'm accustomed to being mistress of the house. Now two queens in one kingdom are impossible—war and strife would inevitably result; and the abdication of one of the queens is hardly a pleasing sight for a newly married couple. You realize this, do you not, Erwin? So here are my conditions: Engage your daughter Sybil to someone and marry her off—which I fancy will not be a difficult task. And when that little goddess has stepped down from the altar at which every sacrifice in your house is made, then come and take home your new bride, beloved! Then I will be ready to enjoy alone all the love and devotion that you wish to bestow upon me!"

She had voiced all this gracefully, in a half-jesting manner, but she was seriously in earnest. He realized this only too well, and so it came to pass that he burned with impatience and longing to bring about the engagement of his daughter as soon as possible, so that his own happiness might be attained. Hitherto his daughter had been heart-whole, and he loved her far too dearly to attempt to force her into a match against her wishes. A chance incident helped him out of his dilemma.

"Who is that good-looking fellow?" asked Sybil one day, struck by the photograph of young Mortimer Trimmis-Seggen which was lying on her father's desk. He acquainted her with the young man's name and circumstances and told her that Mortimer had asked for a rendezvous with him in Paris, at which some weighty business matters were to be discussed.

"When do you leave? What a pity he is not coming here!" Sybil remarked, still gazing at the photograph.

A faint gleam of hope flashed in the eyes of the councilor. "I would be charmed if you would accompany me on this trip, Sybil!"

She threw back her head proudly and again looked cool and disinterested. "So that Herr Trimmis may think I came just to make his acquaintance? You ought to know me better, father!"

He did know her better. He traveled alone to Paris, but when he returned he was accompanied by Mortimer Trimmis. He noted gleefully how his daughter's cheeks flushed when Mortimer appeared unexpectedly before her, and remarked also the glance of undisguised admiration with which the young man regarded Sybil. But Mahlenstadt was too sanguine. The first meeting of these two young people had been like a warm sun on a winter's day—for a few seconds the whole world was bathed in sunshine; then frost and chill appeared once more and killed the blossoms that had been awakened.

Mortimer and Sybil spent whole days together. The young man had no thought of departure, and the girl seemed to have nothing better to do than to devote herself to her guest, yet there was the breath of frost on all things. Without, in field and forest the world was waiting for the approach of spring, while within the councilor peeped impatiently between the portieres of the salon—also waiting for spring.

In the hearth a fire crackled, although it was May. And Mortimer and Sybil sat opposite each other, bored and chilled to the heart, wrapped in boas and coverlets, and froze—froze all to death.

Mahlenstadt paced his room nervously, gnawing his mustache. He was tortured by impatience, which finally goaded him into the determination to bring about Sybil's engagement almost any cost. "If she will not do it gracefully, then I shall use force!"

And the unhappy man lit a cigarette and threw himself on the divan to ponder the easiest means to attain his goal. Suddenly his eye grew bright and a smile of triumphant happiness played across his features. The young people were simply too chilled to dream of engaging themselves, pondered; was it a wonder that their hearts remained cool when their owners had to wrap themselves in boas and coverlets? In no heart do the flame ignite from the mild glow of an open hearth fire; it was the fault of the rainy spring that Mortimer and Sybil had been sitting opposite each other for a fortnight discussing commonplaces, sneezing, yawning and shivering!

All this must be changed! It was not practicable to make the house any warmer—and besides perhaps a change of scene would be welcome, for Sybil's charming boudoir seemed to have lost its spell. So it was settled. Mahlenstadt determined that their chilled blood should be warmed by the sun of the South! A crafty smile played about the lips of the schemer while he raced with feverish excitement to the telephone and implored his physician to pay him a visit immediately.

The doctor was a very sensible man, who made a practice of sending his patients to the South, North, East or West—it made little difference so long as there was a change of air—the cure was often wrought by the jolting of travel.

"Why, of course! I told you long ago that you were in need of a change. Your nerves are laid down—and for such a nervous condition nothing is better than the cutting spring air of the North! Pack up your duds, my dear friend, pack up and travel as quickly as possible to Norway or Sweden!"

The councilor shook his head decidedly. "No, thank you, my dear friend! I can freeze enough right here at home! I want to get warm, to breathe mild air and hear nightingales!"

"Ah, then you want to go South? Splendid idea! That is exactly what will do you the most good. Just as soon as the body demands warmth the demand should be gratified. Nature herself points out the path we ought to follow. Why do you think of Egypt?—it's pretty hot there."

"Oh, that would suit me exactly; but besides the heat I must have rest and, doctor, I am looking for an idyllic spot—no grand hotel with

The Story of a Letter

Mr. Fremont Older is so antipathetic to me that I can scarcely trust myself to write about him. Therefore, I do so as little as possible. That I do so at all is entirely due to the fact that occupying a quasi-public position he has the power and the disposition to do a great deal of mischief and that what mischief he does is in proportion to the ignorance of the public regarding his character. I conceive it to be a sacred duty to assist the public in glimpsing the internal mechanism of this most curiously constituted individual. To this end I will call attention to the Bulletin of Saturday last wherein appears a spiteful letter addressed to A. A. Moore at the County Jail. It is an anonymous letter, designed to wound the feelings of a gentleman who had incurred the disfavor of Fremont Older by courageously expressing his opinion in open court of the editor's intimate friend Judge William P. Lawlor. Now if Mr. Moore had given this letter to the Bulletin for publication I should have nothing to say on the subject. Obviously it was decent for the Bulletin to publish it without Mr. Moore's permission. But the significant fact that it was printed in the Bulletin hours before it was received by Mr. Moore. It was postmarked 2 o'clock August 12, and it was to be presumed that it would be delivered early on the morning of August 13. But letters addressed to prisoners in the County Jail are not delivered promptly. They go through a process that causes delay. This particular letter was not received by Mr. Moore until after 5 o'clock on August 13. Long before that hour he read it in the Bulletin. Now the question is, How did the Bulletin get the letter?

Was Older the Author?

The solution of this question is a fascinating exercise. The speculations that it involves might give one pause, owing to the imputation to which they lead, were it not for the fact that the bars are down, having been taken down by Mr. Older himself when he wantonly, without any possible concern for the public or any other interest, aided the malevolent and spiteful designs of an anonymous letter writer by giving currency to the poisonous product of a venomous pen. This letter, signed "A Legal Friend," which the Bulletin had a copy of before the original was delivered, contained two stanzas from Oscar Wilde's "Ballad of Reading Gaol." Now from this circumstance flows a psychological speculation. Oscar Wilde is one of Fremont Older's favorite authors, and the poem from which the excerpts were made is one that he knows by heart. When he was going to send Flannery to jail over in Marin County, he visited Abbott, the bunko man, one day and recited the whole poem to him for the purpose of harrowing up his feelings and inducing him to accept an immunity bath. By reason of which circumstances, I submit, the suspicion becomes almost imperative that Mr. Older wrote that spiteful anonymous letter. One might argue more cogently than Judge Lawlor argued when he exposed himself to contempt that the letter is characteristic of the spirit which the Bulletin breathes from day to day. Certainly it is characteristic of the manner of the Bulletin with respect to Mr. Moore and his associates during the incarceration which they suffered as a consequence of their impassioned protest against the disgraceful conduct of a judicial pervert.

The Older buzzard hovered over the jail, its heavy wings dripping venom. From day to day the attorneys were discussed in editorials compounded of spite and spleen. How natural that finally should come an anonymous letter, the intensest expression of a vulgar heart, absolute and utter!

If He Didn't Write It

To be sure there is a possibility of my speculations being all wrong. Mr. Older may not be so bad as he seems to me. He must have qualities which escape my observation. However I have the consolation of knowing that I can do him no great injustice since it is not much worse to send a spiteful letter anonymously for the merely brutal purpose of wounding a man's feelings than to aid the detestable design of the author. If Fremont Older has not sounded the depths of the lowest deep of infamy at any rate he has conspicuously revealed himself as the confederate of a man whose pen is brother to the dagger of the assassin who lies in wait.

"I have a long line of ancestors who were all of my trade," said the baker.

"Oh, sort of a bread line," smiled the chump.

Rollo Peters in the Tate Gallery

So Charles Rollo Peters has sold one of his pictures to the Tate Gallery in London! It is a high honor indeed for this great California artist to attain but nobody capable of appreciating his work can say that it is undeserved. Of course it must have been one of his characteristic moonlights that the committee deemed worthy of a place in this splendid collection which is the second best collection of recent masters in Great Britain, the best being the comparatively new Municipal Gallery of Modern Art in Dublin. The correct name of the Tate Gallery is the National Gallery of British Art and as the name indicates, it is devoted principally to the British masters. There are comparatively few pictures by foreigners in the collection, Horace Vernet, Poussin, Brabazon, Millet, Rosa Bonheur who is represented by the great Horse Fair and Delacroix being of the number. Of American artists I recall only two, Whistler and Sargent. Whistler has only one picture there, that great cause of artistic controversy, Battersea Bridge or as he preferred to call it, "Nocturne, Blue and Gold." Sargent has two pictures, one showing two children lighting Japanese lanterns in a garden of lilies and the other his Ellen Terry portrait in which the actress is represented as Lady Macbeth holding the crown of Duncan over her head.

And now to Sargent and Whistler is added Charles Rollo Peters. Decidedly "Charlie" is in the very best of artistic company.

It is an Interesting Collection

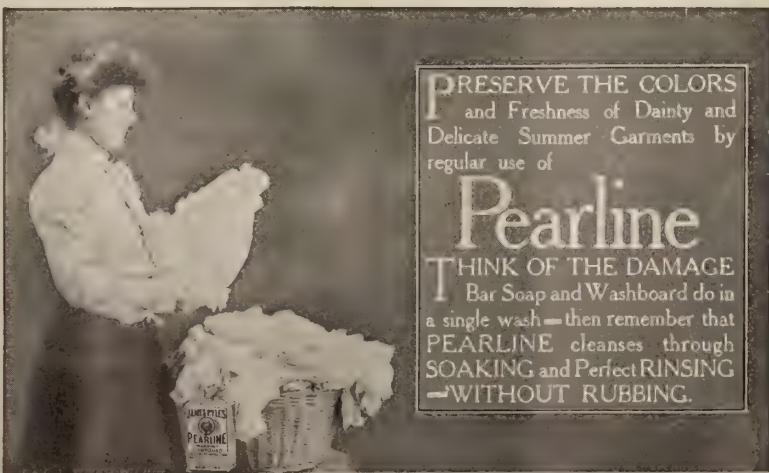

Americans doing London always spend a good deal of time at the Tate Gallery. Its very location on the Thames near Vauxhall Bridge is exceedingly attractive and it numbers some of the pictures by recent British artists of which Americans are fondest. There is Burne-Jones' King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid, "Leighton's Bath of Psyche, Millais' Ophelia, Poynter's Visit to Aesculapius, Rosetti's Beata Beatrix, Watts' Psyche and Love and Life and Yeames' Amy Robsart. There are dogs by Landseer, some glorious Turners and Constables and so many other masterpieces that a morning spent in their inspection almost surfeits one with the beauty of line and color. Henceforth of course Californians will have a more intimate interest in the gallery than before. Congratulations to the artist who has reflected this credit on his State!

The Cost of a Hotel Door

The Geary street annex to the St. Francis Hotel which will afford the after-theater crowd from the Columbia a more convenient entrance to the supper room is nearly completed. Which reminds me of a question. I wonder how many people realize the cost of a hotel door? I happen to know that this new entrance will cost the hotel approximately $6,000 a year. It is about thirty feet deep and of about the dimensions of a comfortable shop which would bring in rent about $150 a month. The wages of two concierges amount to $150 a month, of two maids $100 a month and of two check room boys a similar amount. That makes a total of $500 a month or $6,000 a year. Decidedly it costs money to open a new door in a hotel.

"Hard Lines" for May Yohe

When May Yohe who used to be Lady Francis Hope and afterwards Mrs. Putnam Bradlee Strong arrived in this city to take an engagement as a singer at the Bismarck Cafe she had so severe a cold that her voice was reduced to a raucous whisper. Like all other singers a cold reduces her to a condition bordering on despair and she poured out her woes to the clerk of the St. Francis where she registered. "Gee, it's hard lines," was the way she expressed it. "Here I am expected to sing and that fog of yours has got into me pipes. I ought to be a foghorn out at the Farallones instead of a concert singer."

The Coup of a Mizner

Nothing has been printed about the Mizners for lo, these many days. Not at least for a week has any of the clan made "copy" for the press. These heroes of a thousand incidents of heart and hand, protagonists of innumerable dramas of life in all its fantastic phases, have been singularly quiescent of late. Whatsoever the reason, mine be the task of turning on the limelight once more. For a pretext I must go back to the days of the fistic festival in Reno where Mr. Wilson Mizner towered among the celebrities there assembled. A belated story has come to me about this young man who won and lost the widow Yerkes, one that is illustrative of the resourcefulness and ingenuity characteristic of the Mizner family. The day before the fight Mizner heard that a friend of his from New York had been caught in the dragnet of the police, which had been thrown out to reduce the number of chevaliers d'industrie about town. How to get this friend out of jail became a problem of vital importance to Mizner. To hire a lawyer meant the spending of money, a thing always to be avoided if possible. Besides the lawyer might make a failure of it, for there was a grave charge against the man. To facilitate the solving of the problem Mizner made the acquaintance of the Mayor, the Chief of Police and one or two other officials, and invited them to dinner. He bought wine, and he played the host so successfully that his guests had the time of their lives. They laughed at his stories, and they agreed that he was fine company. And when he expatiated on the charms of Nevada, and told them that next to New York came Reno in his estimation he had them fairly hypnotized. It was then that he touched on the subject nearest his heart. He thought it unfortunate that the fight had attracted so many professional criminals. Their presence in Reno was the one thing to be deplored. He had heard that several had been arrested, and he supposed that after the fight the newspapers would devote a lot of space to their trials, and thus give the town a black eye. Something should be done to prevent such a scandal. He wondered if it wouldn't be advisable to release those criminals from jail on condition that they leave immediately for the East whence they had come. Of course it could be done. And it was done that very night. And Mizner's friend was among those set at liberty.

Neighbor—I'd be hanged if I'd wash for my wife.

Wiggins—You might not for your wife, but you would for mine.

Hearst versus Gaynor

Mayor Gaynor has never been so popular as since an attempt was made upon his life. The bullet of the murderous assailant silenced his enemies and loosened the tongues of his friends. There can hardly be a doubt that the shooting has increased Gaynor's chances for the presidential nomination. Therefore it is quite natural to find his bitterest enemy, William Randolph Hearst, press-agenting the candidacy of Governor Harmon of Ohio. He has taken the trouble to send John Temple Graves to Columbus for an interview with Harmon. Graves is very sanguine about Ohio's democratic governor. "Harmon," he says, "is a name to conjure hope in Democratic ranks and to send a shiver along the spine of Buckeye Republicanism." He compares Harmon to Macbeth which is scarcely a flattering comparison. "Glamis he is and Cawdor and shall be more hereafter." He quotes Harmon as saying that the promise for a Democratic president in 1912 is brighter than it has been in a decade. There is no doubt that Hearst in common with many other astute politicians believes this and that is why he is determined to beat Gaynor if he can. The formation of a national league to agitate against prizefights and the exhibition of prizefight pictures was a Hearst maneuver to embarrass Gaynor who took no steps to interfere with the exhibition of the Jeffries-Johnson films in New York. Just at present Hearst does not dare to attack Gaynor directly, especially as an editorial clipping from the Journal was found in the pocket of Gaynor's would-be slayer, but he is willing to exalt Harmon if the exaltation can be accomplished at Gaynor's expense. Hearst will never forgive the attack which Gaynor made upon him at the Associated Press banquet in the Waldorf-Astoria.

Walter Magee, Motorist

The mysterious injuries from which Walter Magee is suffering in a Los Angeles hospital were probably due to some automobile accident the details of which were carefully kept from the newspapers. Before Walter's reckless dissipation led to his exile from this city—an exile to which his brothers are said to have persuaded him by financial arguments—he was noted for his motorman. Which reminds me of a story. One night he ran over a woman in this city and she was taken to the hospital with severe injuries. Next day a millionaire who was a close friend of Magee called on the woman at the hospital, announced himself as the son of a multimillionaire and asked the woman if she intended to seek damages. She replied that she would demand $500, through the courts if need be. She was then told that if she sued Magee great wealth would be used to fight the case. Whereupon she showed her business sense by replying: "Oh, if Mr. Magee has so much money behind him I'll sue for $5,000." And she did. Magee voted his friend a mighty poor diplomat.

Rudolph on the Job

Back from the East has come the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels, his heart aglow with virtuous intentions, his whole being palpitant with the irrepressible longings of a perturbed but noble and resolute spirit. The times are out of joint, says Mr. Spreckels for publication in his favorite journal, but with the help of God and the co-operation of Roosevelt, not to mention the sympathy of his subterranean majesty, the illustrious young patriot will set them right. He has broadened the scope of his activities. No longer is he concerned merely for the welfare of his native State. The whole nation is in need of his services, for it is fast decaying, and he has formally dedicated his talents to its rejuvenation. With Battle Field La Follette, the Hon. Joseph Wingate Folk, the immaculate Norman Hapgood, the evergreen Lincoln Steffens, and the rarest of his sex, Mr. Belmont Older, he will attack Dishonesty in the Citadel and compel an unconditional surrender. The propaganda of reform, says Mrs. Spreckels, being systematically organized, which means that the muckrakers are to start a few more magazines and take a fresh hold, and that all men in public life who are not in sympathy with the glorious movement will be driven into obscurity.

He's Worrying About Europe

Mr. Spreckels has a brand new motive for his enthusiasm which he acquired about the time of his failure to break into the street railroad business. Now he is moved by the same impulse that caused Mr. Hearst to organize his propaganda against pugilism; he is seized with a consummation passion to improve our reputation abroad. Europe distrusts us, says Mr. Spreckels; European financiers will not buy our securities because they know that three men in this country control our stock market. How unfortunate for those three men that Mr. Spreckels is not one of them! According to the young sugar magnate it is essential that we rehabilitate ourselves in the eyes of Europe. Those vulgar persons who are under the impression that what Europe thinks of this country is what Mr. Roosevelt and his disciples have caused it to think by their uproars, should interview Mr. Spreckels, the backer of the press bureau that blackened the reputation of California in the remotest corners of the earth, and get wise. Among these vulgar persons is that very keen observer, Guglielmo Ferrero, the distinguished author of "The Greatness and Decline of Rome," who was once the guest of Mr. Roosevelt in Washington. After an exhaustive study of conditions in this country Ferrero was amazed to find that they were not as he had been led to believe. He says that this country is not as corrupt or immoral as the nations of Europe, but that it has been made to appear much worse because we make such noisy protests against the evils incident to political and commercial life. In Europe, he says, the moral consciousness is dead, and the things that are there accepted as a matter of course are here shrieked about incessantly. He attributes our vociferations to the liveliness of our moral conscience. If he were to spend a little more time with us he would find another name for "moral consciousness."

A Hint and Some Advice

Whether or not Mr. Spreckels in the heat of his hold-over enthusiasm is symptomatic of the present state of our moral conscience, rightly directed his activities may be productive of much good. If we are no worse than Europe nevertheless we are bad enough, and for the star-eyed goddess the latch-string ought always to be accessible. If Mr. Spreckels will broaden the scope of his moral activities in more than the geographical sense he may win my sympathy and humble support. I am in favor of revising the whole of our social structure, of conducting a general inquest into the abuses of society, and I think it absurd to begin in the field of politics. Our politicians come from commercial life, and we must purge our marts of trade before we can hope to purify our government. As Emerson tells us, in the charge of graft we are all implicated: "it is only necessary to ask a few questions as to the progress of the articles of commerce from the fields where they grew to our houses, to become aware that we eat, drink and wear perjury and fraud in a hundred commodities." Such being the case we are getting exactly the kind of government we deserve, for the demand is for business men for public office and our business men are mostly grafters. Now the only objection to conducting a campaign for reform in business circles is that it is not likely to produce immediate results for the reformer in the way of glorification and political preferment, but this objection should have no weight with Mr. Spreckels. So I hope he will take my hint, and expecting him to do so I will play Polonius and give him this advice—substitute the sentiment of generosity for the passion of revenge. That passion is an insurmountable obstacle to success in all undertakings. Besides it is a vulgar passion, it is the sin of the uninstructed, "the abject pleasure," as Juvenal says, "of an abject mind." A high order of character such as every sincere reformer should have cannot coexist with the spirit of revenge.

The Roosevelts' Good Angel

Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt Jr. have been launched upon their housekeeping under the most favorable auspices in the world. While they were staying at the St. Francis they formed the acquaintance of Mrs. Bowie, the housekeeper of the hotel. What Mrs. Bowie doesn't know about housekeeping has not yet been discovered in that wonderful domestic science. She is a woman of middle age and a grandmother. In the old days she was the housekeeper for the Palace but has been with the caravanserai on Union Square ever since it opened. She has seven assistants and in addition gives order to some 176 men and women. It was in a lucky hour that the young Roosevelts met Mrs. Bowie. They knew about as much about housekeeping as most newlyweds of their condition but they were very anxious to begin aright. So before they opened their pretty little home in Pacific avenue they consulted Mrs.

do not toy with the weed as a regular habit. Those who spend the most time abroad are the most addicted to it, as might be inferred. Women like Mrs. Francis Carolan, Mrs. Peter Martin and Miss Jennie Crocker can appreciate a good cigarette when they inhale its soothing fumes and there is no particular reason why they should not confess the fact. In many other respects they have the courage of their position which allows them to be unconventional, so why not in this also?

Smoking in Hotels

The time will come when women will be allowed to smoke in our big hotels. Mine host John Farley does not interdict the practice in the public dining room of the Cliff House and it is bound to spread. Perhaps some such rule will be made as in the big hotels of China and Japan where women are allowed to smoke in the dining room after half past eight. As soon as the clock points to that time out come the jeweled cigarette cases and the weed is the regular accompaniment to the cafe noir. The only travelers in the Orient who gape at this are the provincials from Akron and Kalamazoo. I recall that when Mrs. Patrick Campbell was here last she was requested not to smoke in the dining room of the St. Francis. A luncheon was given in her honor by Robin de Grey, the financial representative of the Vanderbilts and a brother of Lady de Grey. Mrs. Campbell is a confirmed smoker and when she produced her gold cigarette case toward the conclusion of the luncheon the maitre d'hotel hurried from the room in considerable consternation and indited a polite little note requesting her to desist. Who knows but that when Mrs. Campbell next comes to the city she will be allowed to smoke in public undisturbed? I feel quite sure that the trend is all that way, despite the clamant vociferations of the reformers of other people's morals.

Is Helen Grey Engaged?

Since the departure of beautiful Miss Helen Grey for New York where she will spend the next few months her friends here are wondering whether the rumor of her engagement to Sidney Woodruff, the young architect, will be confirmed by a formal announcement. Previous to her departure Miss Grey was the daily recipient of orchids, the engagement flower of the moment, and it was whispered among her intimates that before leaving for New York Sidney Woodruff had left a standing order with a florist to supply the object of his admiration with these expensive exotics. Even while Miss Grey was out of town she continued to receive this floral homage every day. Sidney Woodruff did a great deal of work in this city in the most strenuous period of rehabilitation and left here after having an acrimonious disagreement with the Barron Estate over the completion of one of its big hotel buildings. It is currently reported that he does not intend to resume his professional work in this city. So Helen Grey may soon be lost to her large circle of San Francisco friends.

The Slashing Head at Del Monte

In his search for a slashing head artist Harrison Fisher has gone to Del Monte. It is to be hoped he finds it and sketches it and retires once more into his orbit. The strain of the quest is beginning to be felt. Totally disinterested people have been affected. They find themselves looking furtively for types in the cafes, at theaters and even in trolley cars, and when they find one that combines both beauty and slash they are no nearer settling the question than they were before. It is manifestly impossible to address a stranger, tell her she has the head Mr. Fisher is seeking and will she kindly furnish her address to be forwarded to the artist. But through some subtle influence of suggestion they are powerless to give up the hunt. The chances of ending it at Del Monte seem favorable. Next week the Bowie and she took the problem into her own hands. Every morning for a week Mrs. Bowie and the Roosevelts would take a taxicab and go out to the new home where the housekeeper initiated the bride and groom into the mysteries of running their establishment. It was child's play for Mrs. Bowie but it was a godsend to young Theodore and his beautiful wife.

They Nearly All Smoke

I make no doubt that if queries on the subject were publicly addressed to most of our society women they would follow the example of Miss Eleanor Sears and deny that they are addicted to the cigarette habit. But such denials need not be taken seriously. Miss Eleanor Sears would never have been as popular as she was with the ladies of Burlingame if she did not have more than a bowing acquaintance with Lady Nicotine. Lady Nicotine may not be in Burke's Peerage but she is exceedingly popular in our most exclusive circles for all that. In fact it is extremely difficult to point out the women in swell society who beauty and fashion of the town will be gathered there as they were once at Belgium's capital on a historic occasion.

Some Likely Candidates

Of last year's debutantes Marian Miller and Miriam McNear are representative of the Fisher ideal. Ruth Richards is a beauty but like Mary Keeney and Florence Hopkins she is not of the slashing order. Neither is the Greuze grace of Alexandra Hamilton's charming head exactly what is sought, nor the Burne-Jones features of Mrs. Oscar Cooper. The most perfect type of slashing beauty is that of Mrs. Norris Davis who as Therese Morgan was the handsomest girl in her set. She is a pronounced blonde with clear cut, somewhat haughty features and a finely modeled contour. Having selected her, however, it is out of the question to recommend Mrs. Davis to Mr. Fisher. She might very reasonably resent it and decline to pose for sketches. It can only be hoped that at Monterey the artist may find a type for himself.

Mrs. Peter Cook is at the Palace.

A Persistent Nuptialist

For a long time Amy Crocker and Maude Treadwell ran a dead heat in the matter of marriages but by her latest venture Maude is entitled to the race. Amy Crocker has only been married three times while Maude Treadwell's union to "Billy" Rix marks her fourth matrimonial venture. Nobody will hazard the assertion that this is to be her last wedding, just as nobody would say that Amy Crocker is done with nuptial experiences. With Maude Treadwell as with Amy Crocker marriage has been put on and off as blithely as a wedding garment. Her first husband was Joe Nolan from whom in due course she obtained a divorce on the vague ground of incompatibility of temper. Then followed her marriage to Maxwell McNutt and this too came to an end in the courts. George Waterbury was her third husband but not for long. Since their divorce nobody seems to know what has become of him. There are certain women for whom the wedded state presents an irresistible but transitory attraction and Maude Treadwell is one of them. Apparently she has made the poet's injunction, "Never give all thy heart," the rule of her life; towards all her husbands she has exhibited a passionate attachment, but the fire has invariably burned to ashes, only to be kindled for somebody else.

A Swat at Mrs. Miller Graham

Mrs. William Miller Graham of Santa Barbara and London has been swatted—and swatted hard—in her home town. Some Santa Barbarians who hides his or her identity under the mask of anonymity has dared to belittle Mrs. Graham's London social triumphs and has received a hearing from the editor of the Los Angeles Spectator. This is the manner in which Mrs. Graham is put on the grill:

"Your comments on Mrs. W. M. Graham of Santa Barbara interested me, though I am inclined to think the statement that 'she was at once introduced into the king's own set' is rather hyperbolic. I was assured by a man of the highest social standing in San Francisco who visits Santa Barbara often and knows Mrs. Graham well, that her whole scheme of social advancement in London was built on a bow she received from the late King at Marienbad, when she and Maxine Elliott (who has an excellent social position in England) were together. It was well-known that the late King was a great admirer of pretty women, and not much introduction was necessary. But the present King and his wife have no taste for the shrewd financiers and wealthy new-rich that had so fine a time under the rule of the late Edward VII. Abundance of money and colossal cheek will not be all that will be required at the present court. So I think that the social way of Mrs. W. M. Graham and of people of her type, will be strewn with difficulties in the future. To say that she can find diversion sufficient outside the court circle is all very well, but what she wants is the smiles of Royalty. Of course, she can give big parties and get lots of people, some with handles to their names and of good family and associations, to come to them; there may be a sprinkling of ribbons and orders and handsome uniforms, and altogether more brilliance than in this country, except at Washington. But what a woman like Mrs. W. M. G. wants, is to be able to read in American newspapers accounts of her having had Royalty at her entertainments. By long and patient work, under good tuition, she may achieve her end but she is not going to reach the goal at a leap. To a similar woman of English birth, unless she was married to a man of high distinction, it would be simply impossible."

After "Seven Days"

By Edward F. O'Day

"I admit that 'Seven Days' is very good," said The Old Timer, "but compared to a farce which I remember seeing at the old California—"

"There you go again," interrupted The Young Man; "always harping on that confounded old California stock company. Are you a playgoer or a historian?"

"My boy," answered The Old Timer, fishing the ice out of his Scotch, "when you reach my age you will find amusement a very serious matter. The pleasures of retrospect are the only ones that don't leave a headache or remorse."

"Have another retrospect," suggested The Young Man, touching the bell, "and confess that you have seldom laughed more than you did to-night."

"It was contagious," said The Old Timer; "besides you got an absurd amount of enjoyment out of it and I was laughing at you. What was it that appealed to you so much?"

"Well," replied The Young Man, considering, "that dumb waiter was a scream."

"I recall that that 'Pigs is Pigs' fellow used the same idea in a story not so long ago," mused The Old Timer.

"How about the egg scene; can you beat it?" challenged The Young Man.

"My boy, puns are atrocious and besides, when your digestive apparatus is as old as mine the cook book will be no subject for jocularity."

"I think there is one of those cook books with a glazed white cover at the house," said The Young Man; "I'm going to take a look at it to see if that omelet recipe reads as it did in the play."

"Don't let your intended see you looking in a cook book," cautioned The Old Timer. "Women have suspicious minds."

"That reminds me," cut in The Young Man.

"I agree with the chap in the play who said he wouldn't marry a girl unless she knew how to cook."

"That's what they all say," jeered The Old Timer; "and they always marry the other kind of girl. Even the fellow in the play did."

"I never knew there was so much science in an omelet," continued The Young Man, lighting a cigarette. "How do you suppose they ever make a poached egg sit on a piece of toast?"

"It's heredity," explained The Old Timer gravely. "The chickens are trained to it before they commence laying."

"Your humor is not up to the 'Seven Days' standard," rebuked The Young Man. "There were some clever lines in that play. I liked that one, 'Remember, even a newspaperman may have a mother.' Cynical as the deuce, isn't it?"

"The sort of cynicism that a newspaperman outgrows with his cubdom," returned The Old Timer.

"I don't get that," said The Young Man, sipping his highball. "But I liked that other line, 'I haven't been up this early since the last time I stayed up this late.' You'll admit that was clever."

"The late hour epigram is a cherished theatrical property," explained The Old Timer; "but it is not popular at the domestic hearth. Never attempt one when you are married."

"What was it that chap got off when Aunt Selina said that whiskey, divorces and low-necked gowns were what Hell was made of?" asked The Young Man.

"Oh death, where is thy sting?" The Old Timer reminded him.

"Well, wasn't that very good?" inquired The Young Man.

"Not half bad in the context," admitted The Old Timer, "but it has a dreary Carrie Nation effect when detached. Besides, it's false. I'm too old fashioned to get used to divorce, and I'm prejudiced about whiskey, but the low-necked gown is all right when it's kept in its place."

"While I'm catering to your prejudice," said The Young Man touching the bell again, "tell me what is its place."

"My boy, do not pretend to be unsophisticated," parried The Old Timer. "Besides it's getting late."

"Well, I'm sorry you didn't like 'Seven Days,'" said The Young Man rising. "I intend to see it again."

"You might order me a couple of tickets," said The Old Timer.

"But I thought—" began The Young Man.

"I want to verify certain comparisons with a farce I saw at the Baldwin," explained The Old Timer rapidly.

"You're a humbug," said The Young Man.

"So are we all," sighed The Old Timer. "That explains the popularity of farces."

A Town Talk Prophecy Fulfilled

When pretty vivacious Miss Zoe Barnett first appeared at the Princess Theater in this city with the company which was headed by Miss Cecilia Rhoda Town Talk prophesied that she would some day conquer New York's great white way. It seems that the prophecy is soon to be fulfilled. Miss Barnett has been climbing the ladder to stage success very rapidly of late and now the news comes that she will create the principal soubrette role in the musical comedy "Jinga Boo," the work of Leo Dietrichstein and others. This will be a John Cort attraction on Broadway during the coming season and it will mark the turning point in Miss Barnett's career. Here's hoping that she will be all kinds of a success!

SCENE FROM THE BIG COMEDY SUCCESS "SEVEN DAYS" AT THE COLUMBIA THEATER.

Stage

Charles Frohman Talks

Charles Frohman has been talking to a New York interviewer. This is unusual, for Frohman is one of the most reticent men in the theatrical business. Instead of talking he has always hired people to do the talking for him. And Frohman is not widely known, except by name and achievement. Hundreds of actors who appear in his productions do not know him by sight. It is said that he can walk along Broadway from Forty-second street to his office in the Empire Theater building, running the gauntlet of innumerable unemployed tragedians and comedians who line the thoroughfare without being recognized by a dozen of them. But when Frohman talks he says things worth hearing, speaking in epigram mostly and frequently in cryptic phrases. "What is the most notable improvement in the drama in recent years?" asked the interviewer. "The disappearance of the self-sacrificing hero and heroine from our stage," answered Mr. Frohman. "Whom do you consider the greatest English dramatist?" asked the interviewer. "The one who writes the last great play," answered Mr. Frohman. "And the greatest American dramatist?" "The one whose plays the greatest number of good Americans go to see." "What seat in a theater do you consider the best?" "The paid one," answered Mr. Frohman. "In all your work what gives you the most pleasure?" was the next question. "Seeing the perfect performance of a play before the audience sees it," answered Mr. Frohman. "If you had your life to live over again would you become a theatrical manager?" "If I could be surrounded by the same circle of players and writers that have made me, yes; otherwise no." "What form of entertainment do you think New Yorkers like best?" "I think New York most fond of comedy. It likes comedy when it is human and has sentiment, because the women of New York compel the success of any play or any theater. By sentiment or love in a play I do not mean the old-fashioned love scenes. They are gone, I believe, along with the leading actor with the fancy stripe in his trousers." "And the problem plays?" "I believe the problem play will be with us always. I believe we shall always have all kinds of plays, just as we shall always have all kinds of human beings."

Two Self-Made Stars

It is a truism that the charms of domesticity cannot quell the artistic temperament. From across the puddle comes evidence that this remains true even when the domesticity is of the gilded variety. For the Marchioness of Headfort is going to interrupt the aristocratic leisure of her life at Kells in Ireland long enough to astonish the dramatic critics with her interpretation of Lady Teazle in "The School for Scandal." At the same time Mrs. William E. Corey is going to favor the elite of London with a production of "The Taming of the Shrew" in which she will enact the part of Katharine. Needless to say these two wealthy women will finance the ventures themselves. That the ventures will be artistic as well as social triumphs may not yet be said. The Marchioness of Headfort never had an opportunity to play Lady Teazle in her professional days. She was Rosie Boote of the Gaiety Theater in London and was noted for her pretty face. Mrs. Corey, it will be remembered, was Mabel Gilman who first burst into notice as a Daly chorus girl. She was noted for her shapely legs. As the parts of Lady Teazle and Katharine demand more than prettiness of face and shapeliness of leg it will be interesting to see just how far the artistic temperaments of these two ambitious women will carry them.

Rose Stahl Coming

Rose Stahl's performance of Patricia O'Brien in James Forbes' comedy "The Chorus Lady" was one of the biggest hits of the season before last in this city. Since that time Patricia O'Brien has been taken to London by Miss Stahl and proved as big a favorite on the other side of the Atlantic as she has on this side. Rose Stahl is going to bring "The Chorus Lady" to the Columbia Theater on Monday, September 5. It will be a fitting bill for the big celebration week.

Hackett in "Samson" Again

Hackett's farewell week at the Alcazar, commencing Monday evening, will be devoted to a revival of "Samson," the play with which his season opened. Since then he has appeared in many other plays, but none of them has created the profound impression he made in this intense drama of modern life, and since its withdrawal the demand that it be restored has been so insistent that the management considered it good business policy to substitute it for another play which has been scheduled for the last week of the season.

The Bevanis at Idora

For the sixth week of the Idora opera season the Bevani singers will produce "Rigoletto" and "Traviata." "Rigoletto" was given three weeks ago and proved to be the most popular opera of the Bevani repertoire. It will be sung at the matinee and evening performances on Sunday; also on Monday and Tuesday. For the remainder of the week, with a matinee on Saturday, "Traviata" will be the offering. Then follows "The Love Tales of Hoffmann."

The Savoy Reopens

"The Lottery Man," a new comedy by Rida Johnson Young will be presented by the Shuberts at the Savoy Theater beginning next Sunday evening for a two weeks' engagement with the regular Saturday matinees and a special popular Thursday dollar matinee. The central figure in "The Lottery Man" is Jack Wright, a news-gatherer, played by William Rosell. He is a warm friend of Foxy Payton who owns the paper and when he gets a Wall street tip, Wright goes to his chief for money, promising as security, in the event of failure, his pledge to turn in to the paper one of the biggest stories New York has ever known. As the tip fails, Wright is compelled to make good. This he does by offering himself as the prize in a lottery which is to be conducted by the newspaper. Interesting complications follow.

Minnie Dupree at the Orpheum

Miss Minnie Dupree and her company will appear at the Orpheum next week in the one-act play by Frank Ferguson, "The Minister's Wife." It tells an original and novel story and is an excellent vehicle for the full display of Miss Dupree's talents. The Six Kaufmanns, the world famed family of cyclists, will be in the new bill. Al Jolson, blackface, will contribute the songs and witticisms which won him fame in New York. Renee who in England is styled the "Goddess of Music" will display her musical versatility. Next week will be the last of J. C. Nugent and Julia York in "The Squarer," Flanagan and Edwards. The Harvey-De Vora Trio and "The Opera Festival."

Ade's Best at Ye Liberty

Izetta Jewel's sixth week with the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will be devoted to "The College Widow." Elaborate preparations are being made for its presentation, for the piece offers much in a scenic way, and the cast to be headed by Miss Jewel as the widow and Mr. Ayres as the half-back will be an exceedingly strong one. After one week of the college comedy Miss Jewel enters into the last week of her engagement in "Captain Jinks of the Horse Guards."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Trading in stocks the past week has been light, but prices on the whole have shown a little stronger tone and with the exception of Smelters Common, a fair gain. The news has been generally favorable. Crop conditions are as a rule more favorable and estimates have been raised especially in the production of wheat. The Steel corporation's monthly report while it showed a decrease in unfilled orders of 286,000 tons, was considered favorable, inasmuch as their business at this time of the year generally shows a falling off. There were several rumors out that steel bars had been cut $2 per ton but this was denied both by the Steel Corporation and the Independents. Smelter has been the target for the bears and this stock has been under pressure all week. Rumor has it that owing to the curtailment in the production of copper metal a good many of the Smelters' plants have been closed down indefinitely and this has so affected the earnings of the company that a reduction in their dividend is expected at the next meeting which is on September 1. The money market remains quiet with call money around 1½ per cent. The best judges of finance look for a little tightening up in the rates this fall but no real stringency is in sight. The market acts firmly and is being supported on any signs of weakness. Outside business is very light, but confidence is gradually being restored and it looks as if we were in for a further improvement in prices.

Grain—An addition of 42,000,000 bushels to the wheat crop of the United States as compared with the estimate of a month ago was made last Monday when the government raised its former figures on winter wheat. This addition to the crop removes the probability of sensational claims or prices during a good part at least of the present crop year. There is a comfortable surplus for export and reserves and the theory of a domestic basis of values is wiped out. Meanwhile it remains to be seen if the government will ultimately advance the spring wheat crop estimates. The trade reports of harvesting and of the quality of the grain now coming to market rather indicate that the spring wheat damage claims have also been overdrawn. By the time the harvest in Europe is finished and the new crop marketings have fairly begun, it is quite possible that there may be some reaction from the present levels.

Corn—Prices last week made up the losses sustained the week before. There was little rain over the corn belt as a whole. Pastures were suffering greatly and speculators were not hampered by enormous receipts. Farmers were generally busy with the thrashing of small grains and were doing little in the way of marketing corn; meanwhile consumers' demands were up to about seasonable and speculators had no difficulty in advancing prices of futures.

Cotton—Continued dry weather in Texas gave the market a firm start the first part of the week and new high levels were reached in all the deferred months. Trade was active and sentiment extremely bullish with many predicting 15 cent cotton this month for the October delivery. Heavy rains in parts of Texas and reports of a better outlook for the crop east of the Missisissippi River caused heavy selling in the way of profit taking which was brought about by a prominent house that had been very bullish on cotton issuing a very bearish circular estimating the new crop around 13 million bales. The market lost all of the advance scored early in the week and final prices last Saturday were at the lowest point of the week. Texas has had a good deal of rain the past week but reports are so conflicting that it keeps the market nervous and prices are easily influenced either way. The weather east of the Mississippi River has been ideal since July 25 at which time the government made their last estimate and it is admitted by the trade that conditions have improved considerably—say 5 per cent. Admitting that the Texas condition has deteriorated 10 per cent the government's next condition report should be around 75 per cent against a condition last year of 66 per cent, which cannot be considered other than a bearish document. Of course it is a little too early to begin discounting the next bureau report, but with occasional showers during the next two weeks cotton prospects will show to a much better advantage. New cotton is arriving more freely at the different ports and receipts are much larger than they were in 1908 when the crop was over 13 million bales. This either shows that the farmer is satisfied with present prices or that the crop is turning out much better than reports from the south would indicate. All things considered it is only natural to expect a decline in price during the crop movement. Twenty-five per cent of the mills are shut down and 50 per cent of the remaining mills are working on short time and with spinners in the market for only a limited amount of cotton and a larger movement in sight, it looks to us as if lower prices are inevitable.

Copper—There is nothing new in the market for copper stocks. The metal market remains practically unchanged and prices for the different copper stocks have been influenced by the trend of values in the railroad list.

An Appreciative Judge

M. Barboux, the eminent French lawyer, who died recently, was well known as an after-dinner speaker, and had a wonderful fund of good law-court stories. Perhaps the best of them is the conversation which he declared he overheard in the lobby outside the divorce court one afternoon.

"Well, how did you get on?"

"Splendidly. I got my divorce and care of the child. The judge was on my side, you know."

"A friend of yours?"

"Well—not a friend exactly. He used to be my wife's first husband."

Beginner (wrathfully)—Look here, I'm tired of your laughing at my game. If I hear any more impudence from you I'll crack you over the head.

Caddie—All right; but I'll bet yer don't know what's the right club to do it with.

uniformed attendants, dusty promenades and daily doses of mock-turtle soup. I want nature, scenery, lovely seclusion, with the sun burning through the myrtle trees!"

The doctor stroked his beard thoughtfully, lost in thought. After a while he gleefully raised his head. "The Misocco Valley—there you will find all that you desire: the hot Italian sun, quiet and seclusion. I frequently think of the happy hours I once spent in the idyllic house of Don Domenico. I do not recall now what it was that charmed me most, whether the wild scenery of the valley or the succulent macaroni served by the fascinating and fiery Gina—but the fact remains that I loved that wonderful valley."

A smile of self-satisfaction was playing over Mahlenstadt's healthy round face as he started for the dining-room, where the two young people were awaiting him. In the hall he retarded his eager steps and drew his jolly features into deep folds; then he dragged himself across the threshold of the dining-room, affecting great exhaustion. Sybil started in alarm, and even Mortimer raised his head surprisedly.

"For heaven's sake, papa, you look as though you were suffering! Where have you been so long? Are you ill?"

The councilor coughed, affected an expression of still greater suffering and dropped limply into one of the leather-covered chairs—still gallant enough, however, to kiss his daughter's hand.

"I beg your pardon for having kept you waiting, but I was just in the midst of a visit from my doctor, and the examination lasted longer than I thought it would."

"Examination, Herr Mahlenstadt?"

"Oh, father, are you really sick? I always said that your influenza had left you with a cough! Did the doctor find something the matter with your lungs?"

Mahlenstadt affectionately stroked the pale face of the girl.

"Not the lungs, sweetheart, though the doctor at first believed they were affected. Now he thinks it is only the nerves."

Sybil drew a sigh of relief. "God be praised, for they can soon be cured. But I had never noticed anything—"

"I was determined not to show it," whispered the patient, raising his soup spoon with great effort. "My official work is exhausting, is it not, Trimmis?"

"I am only a beginner, so I can't speak from experience, but to judge by my father's case I should say that your sort of work makes tremendous demands on one. The doctors declare that my father must take a holiday of at least four months in each year."

"A change of air—travel—is not that what they advise?"

"Yes, and as decided climatic changes as possible."

"Does the doctor want you to travel, papa?"

"Yes, but under your care, my sweetheart; solitude is bad for me."

"You know how gladly I will accompany you. Did the doctor order you to take sea baths?"

"No, he thought that the cold air was harmful, and wanted me to sun myself in the bewitching valley of Misocco."

"Misocco! It seems to me I have seen the name in a Baedeker," suggested Mortimer.

"What! You don't know Misocco! Certainly you don't plan to return to America without having learned the charms of the Italian Alps! I tell you, my young friend, you must accompany us. Instead of remaining my guest here I invite you to be my guest in Greno. Agreed?"

Mortimer Trimmis respectfully nodded acceptance, but neither of the others noticed the happy flash of his eye, nor did he see the joyful flush that rose to Sybil's cheek.

"Then we start as soon as possible. I can't tell you how eager I am for the warm Italian sun, the sun that throws you out and makes you feel there is still a heart in your breast!"

Accidentally the eyes of the two young people met as the councilor uttered these words; then with a quick flush each stared away again into the shadows of the great room.

"It's fearfully cold here!" said Sybil; and mechanically she drew the boa tighter about her slender neck.

II.

It seemed as though the weather had been waiting for the departure of this trio of travelers. During the last two days of preparation a bright, warm sun glared through the high windows, and when the travelers were installed in the narrow compartment of their train the temperature was so warm that the fur boa was quickly exchanged for one of chiffon. Soon the reign of even the chiffon boa was at an end, and Sybil was reduced to fanning herself with her lace-edged handkerchief, while Mortimer mopped his brow repeatedly. The councilor was as happy as a cat dozing in the sunshine and murmured reassuringly: "Thank heaven, now I feel the blood in my veins again!"

"These narrow compartments are so sultry that the heat gets on my nerves," said Sybil. "I'm glad we will soon be enjoying the fresh air where I can breathe once more!"

"Yes, and the air of the Alps can certainly never grow oppressively hot," Mortimer assured her. And each of the two young people gazed indifferently past each other, watching the flying landscape.

"Just wait, you two," thought Papa Mahlenstadt, rejoicing in his scheme. "I'll melt you until you are soft as butter!"

The trip was long and monotonous, and each of the travelers drew a breath of relief when the beauty of the Misocco Valley unfolded before their eyes. The landscape glistened in the rays of the moon. The air was heavy with the scent of blossoms, and birds sobbed sweetly in the bushes.

Slowly the three newly arrived guests strolled through the enchanting garden, the councilor secretly noting the marked difference in the expression of the two young people. True, they still paced silently, save that Sybil threw a glance at the mountain peaks and whispered: "Oh, how beautiful it is here!" and Mortimer caressed the branches, thick with blossoms, and repeated, smiling ecstatically: "Oh, how beautiful!"

"Yes, and it will be even more beautiful! Don Domenico has assured me that within a few days we will be enjoying midsummer weather!" The councilor smiled as he spoke, for in his mind's eye he saw a vision of the hymeneal torch flaring its greeting in this peaceful paradise.

It did become hot, very hot; and with each day the heat increased. At first the trio took excursions to the neighboring points of interest; but soon the heat grew so oppressive that such tours were abandoned, the young people whiling away their days by lolling in hammocks, reading romances. The garden was very beautiful, but the weather was far too hot, even under the shadows of the high and noble chestnut trees. Sybil was lying stretched in a hammock; her book was lying beside her and her arms were stretched under her head. She appeared to be in no mood whatever for love-making. During the first days Mortimer had been seized with the desire to place his wicker chair very near to the hammock of the charming dreamer, but now the weather had grown so warm that unconsciously he moved his chair to some distance, as if to avoid even the proximity of a human creature. Dreamily the young man closed his eyes, and forgot even to smoke his cigar. The newspaper was flung carelessly across his knees. Both of the young people seemed bored, both appeared to sleep. In reality they were pondering the intangible object that like some cold, dark shadow had thrust itself between them and darkened their existence for several weeks. Both recalled the day on which they had met. Then they sat opposite each other in Sybil's boudoir and looked into each other's eyes, conscious of a welling sensation that thrilled them. They had chattered merrily and excitedly, he describing his home and drawing forth a case containing photographs of his parents' home. Suddenly his hand had suspiciously thrust back a small picture, while a flush suffused his face—he grew as confused as a boy who had been caught picking cherries.

It was a photograph of a girl!

Sybil had caught but a glimpse of it, and only Mortimer's embarrassment emphasized its importance. Then she realized that it must be the picture of his love—the woman who had won his heart. At that moment she had grown chilly, and had wrapped the boa about her shivering neck. All interest in his home vanished and her conversation dwindled into monosyllables.

Mortimer had continued his share of the conversation eagerly until he had noticed how changed her manner had become. Accidentally his glance followed the hand that was drawing the boa about her neck and he noticed with a start that a small gold band encircled one of her fingers.

Of course, it was an engagement ring. Then all her former charm of manner had simply been a show of hospitality extended to the son of her father's friend! Mortimer was not in the habit of asking indiscreet questions, but it suddenly seemed to him that the room was very cold; and mechanically he drew the silk coverlet of the divan across his knees.

There it had been bleak and cold; now the hot sun of Italy was beating down upon them and the sultry air scarce allowed them to breathe, yet it seemed that in the breast of each there beat a heart of ice or stone. The councilor had waited a week, then a fortnight. Each morning he had noted the cloudless azure sky, the sign that betokened hot days; yet the heat did not suffice to melt the lumps of ice in the breasts of the two young people, nor did the glare of the sun and the solitude drive them into each other's arms. Instead they constantly grew paler, more reticent, more nervous.

Mahlenstadt was beside himself with impatience. In his exasperation he had written to the widow recounting the result of his experiment, and in her answer he seemed to hear the silvery, taunting laugh of his enchantress: "But, my dearest Erwin! What a barbarous plan to try to fuse by Italy's sun two hearts that wish to have nothing to do with each other! If only you had confided to me what your scheme was! You men have absolutely no talent for love intrigues. Allow me to handle this affair. I believe I am sufficiently acquainted with the working of Sybil's heart to know that for a long time it has been beating for an Adonis whom I had invited to my salon so that I might interest him in Sybil. I feel pretty sure of my scheme and beg you to do as I tell you. Pack your trunks immediately and journey with your daughter to this place. A telegram from me will lure the Adonis here within two days. Your idea of wishing to engender heat by heat is a fallacy. 'Les extremes se touchent!' Hearts will glow more readily during a sleigh ride than on a promenade through the desert. Hearts that are frost bitten must be warmed by rubbing them with snow. The lovers must be sent up here among the ice! I came here to Mt. Pilatus on account of my nerves. The wind howls energetically here and there are very few people. So come and try the game: Va banque, and let me be the croupier in this gamble."

When Mahlenstadt read this scented note he looked much dismayed. Heat had availed him nothing in his scheme, so he decided to try the cold bleakness of the Alps.

From that hour the councilor complained constantly of incessant headaches, the result of the oppressive heat. He longed for a breath of fresh air, and declared that his physician had advised him to take a trip to Switzerland, to Mt. Pilatus.

To his amazement his proposition met with no objection. Sybil looked at him gratefully, as though she were to be relieved of a tortured existence. "Thank God that we can once more breathe fresh air. This heat is unbearable and I shall be happy when the moment for departure arrives."

Mortimer Trimmis looked thoughtfully after the ring of smoke that he had blown into the air and remarked with a melancholy nod of his fine head: "I am not particularly fond of the heat either, and have noticed that in the last few days it has reduced my energy very much.

My nerves are better fitted for a climate of snow and ice."

The councilor looked at the speaker anxiously for a moment. The matter of business between them had been settled, but it would have pleased him very much to have the young man journey farther on his own account.

"You certainly ought first of all to see the bigger places in Switzerland," suggested Papa Mahlenstadt cordially and diplomatically; "especially now that this opportunity presents itself."

"I will consider it," nodded the young man; and the glance that escaped from under his eyelids directed a question at Sybil.

When the day for departure came the trio again occupied the same compartment, and Mortimer declared: "First of all I shall accompany you to Mt. Pilatus. After that I will plan a further trip!"

As soon as they had arrived Mahlenstadt declared that he had contracted a slight attack of rheumatism and wished to remain in his room. It was therefore all the more charming to discover quite by accident that a friend of his, a widow, was quartered in the same hotel. The little widow seemed also to have become the victim of a slight cold which dictated her remaining indoors; and so she and the councilor abandoned all ideas of climbing tours and contented themselves with chatting in the hotel reading-room.

With a roguish smile the widow had announced that within the next day or two a friend of hers would join the party. The news was received with complete indifference by Sybil, but with rather a show of anxiety by Mortimer.

Despite the fact that the heavens were clouded, Mortimer and Sybil chose to brave the crisp, cold air of the Alps. Warmly clad and armed with alpenstocks, they had begun a tour on foot to Aemsigen. The wind arose and drove hummocks of clouds scudding before it; the temperature dropped, and Mortimer looked anxiously at his companion.

"Aren't you cold?" he inquired. "It is not at all impossible that a snowstorm may overtake us."

For answer she looked laughingly up at him, her eyes gazing into his own with marvelous frankness. And so they wandered along beside each other, solitary in this great height between heaven and earth, surrounded by the tremendous magnificence of the Alpine giants. The wind grew in its rage and the whirling snow clouded the peaks of the surrounding mountains. Mortimer was not frightened, because they were following a path along the railway track, and he knew that inside of a quarter of an hour they would reach Aemsigen. Above them was the rushing sound of howling wind, and the crowns of the pines shook and swayed like a storm-tossed sea. It grew very cold and the path underfoot became slippery.

"Give me your arm, Sybil," he bade her quietly.

The two walked closely together in the narrow footpath, her head almost caressing his shoulder as he tried to shelter her with the umbrella. He wrapped his coat about her; arm in arm they battled against the storm until they arrived in Aemsigen and found refuge in a small hut near the railway station. As they were warming themselves Mortimer noticed that the ring had disappeared from the finger of his companion.

"Have you lost your ring?" he asked.

With a cry of dismay the girl noted her loss. "My ring! For heaven's sake—I must find it again—I dare not lose it!" And she started eagerly for the door to begin the search.

Moodily he held her back. "What an impossible search that would be. Surely the ring can be replaced."

"Never! Do let me hunt," she sobbed.

"Is this little token so valuable to you that you wish to risk your life in finding it?" he asked bitterly, no longer barring her way.

"How can you ask that—you who speak of your mother as the best of all saints!"

"Mother?" He looked at her in amazement. "What has a mother to do with your engagement ring?"

"She wore it during the greater part of her

The Physicians of the Murine Eye Remedy Company, Chicago, U. S. A., Oculists of years' standing, carefully prepare "The Murine Eye Remedies" in the Company's Laboratory. These Remedies are the result of their Clinical, Hospital and Private Practice, and they have found from their years of experience with Children's Eyes, that two drops of Murine in each Eye of the Growing Child is of inestimable value. Murine is an Eye Tonic and they know, if it is used regularly, that it Tones the Eye of the Growing Child and in many instances obviates the use of Glasses, and is it not reasonable that Glasses when not required will retard the development of a young and growing Eye?

Murine, through its Tonic effect, Stimulates Healthy Circulation and thus promotes the normal development of the Eye. We do not believe there is a Mother who has used Murine in her own Eyes and in the Eyes of the members of her family who would be without it, or who is not willing to speak of its Merits as The Household Friend.

The Child in the Schoolroom needs Murine. Murine contains no harmful or prohibited Drugs, and conforms to the Laws of the Country.

Druggists everywhere will supply Murine and tell you of its gratifying results.

life; it is the most precious thing she bequeathed me."

"Then the ring is your mother's engagement ring and not your own, Sybil? You are not engaged?" The man had grasped the girl's hands and stared into her eyes, intoxicated by happiness. Then Sybil began to understand the error that had held him in complete possession. Her hands shook nervously and her glance faltered.

"Didn't you know that?" she whispered.

"No, I did not. Oh, Sybil!"

The wind howled about the house, driving the snow and hail against the window-panes. It was bitter cold, but a passionate warmth streamed from the hearts of these two young people.

Suddenly she struggled to free her hands, and again a chill possessed her, as she asked: "Why should that interest you—you who are bound to someone in your own country?"

"I?"

"The picture of that woman in your collection of photographs!"

Then he laughed in sheer happiness. "Let me confess, Sybil," he cried joyously. "I loved that woman from the very moment I first saw her picture in my father's leather case. I still love her, more than ever, and will always love her. Look for yourself, and see if you do not approve of my choice!" He opened his leather case and took out the small photograph. Sybil uttered a cry of surprise when she saw a photograph of herself bearing the inscription in her father's handwriting: "To my dear John Trimmis, so that he may see how the 'baby' has grown in six years."

Her face flushed with happiness.

"Sybil!"

While they sat together, hand in hand, on the narrow wooden bench, waiting for the train to carry them back to Mt. Pilatus, the widow and the councilor sat gloomily at the hotel window and stared out at the whirling snow. In the widow's lap lay a telegram reading: "Impossible to come. Am engaged to be married. Letter to follow."

The despatch bore the name of the man whom the widow had lured to her salon in the hope of interesting him in Sybil.

"Mary, I implore you, withdraw the conditions you have insisted upon," groaned Mahlenstadt, pressing the widow's hands to his lips. "I can stand this waiting no longer!"

The widow shook her head sadly. "Sybil and I simply would not get on, and our marital happiness would be wrecked in a few weeks."

"Then let me send her to some relatives—or on a long trip."

"Certainly not—I shall not crowd the child out of her home. I want her to leave it happily and of her own accord."

The sound of steps was heard in the corridor and as the door was flung wide Sybil and Mortimer appeared on the threshold.

"So you are back," the widow anxiously called to them. "Are you frozen? Was it not frightful out in that storm?"

"No, it was heavenly!" shouted Mortimer.

Sybil threw her arms about her father's neck and whispered something into his ear. To the amazement of the young couple the councilor embraced the widow. And that evening two engagements were celebrated in the hotel on Mt. Pilatus.

1911 CHALMERS MOTOR CARS

WILL ARRIVE AUGUST 15th

Refined But Practically Unchanged 1909 and 1910 Good Enough

The Chalmers cars come from a factory producing quality and not quantity. THE CHALMERS PRINCIPLE is not to make as many cars as possible, but TO MAKE EACH INDIVIDUAL CAR AS GOOD AS POSSIBLE.

We regret that we were not able to furnish 1909 and 1910 models to all who wanted them, and while we fear that some were offended when told that they could not get the cars they wanted, we assure every one that it is much harder to tell a prospective buyer that he cannot have the car than it is to show him why he should have one.

It is possible that the Chalmers factory could build a sufficient number of cars to take care of every available customer, but in so doing they would, like a large number of other factories, sacrifice quality for quantity, and every car sold would not make a customer for another, as has been our experience during the past two years.

A few cars are still available for September delivery.

Auto Notes

H. D. Ryus, better known as Captain Ryus, has just joined the sales force of the San Francisco branch of the White Company. Ryus is well known throughout the entire coast section as a veteran auto man and has been prominently connected with the White during several years both in business capacity and as a driver in various contests. It was he who piloted the White in its victorious climbs up Mt. Baldy and he was one of the drivers on the great San Francisco to Los Angeles and return record run of the White Steamer.

J. W. Chandler has just made a trip from Berkeley to Woodville, Oregon, in his White Gasoline car during which he three times rose to an elevation exceeding 4,000 feet. The route chosen took the party through Ukiah, the Medicine Mountains, Eureka, Crescent City and Waldo. This is the hardest course that could possibly have been selected and is replete with steep and tortuous grades.

Because of a cut made by an exceptionally sharp rock T. J. Carrigan has just removed a Diamond casing that had given 8,765 miles of service from his big Royal car. But for the cut the tire would have been good for much more mileage.

Percy Walker, Pacific Coast representative of the American Automobile Association and one of the best known motor car enthusiasts in the west, has just equipped his big Thomas car with Diamond tires.

C. W. Newhouse, sales manager for S. G. Chapman, reports the arrival of a shipment of Hupmobiles which are now being equipped for delivery. A shipment of Oakland 40's is also due.

S. G. Chapman, the well known local automobile dealer, has left for the East where he will visit the several factories for the cars of which he holds the agency in this territory. While gone arrangements will be made for 1911 allotments and numbers far exceeding those handled this season will be contracted for. Beside arranging for a large supply of the new makes recently added to his lines Chapman will also very materially increase his Oakland and Hupmobile allotments.

That Lozier automobiles are unusually economical in matter of tires is testified to by James Tyson, the well known lumber man in this city who says that he has run his seven-seat Lozier automobile 10,582 miles and that the tires are the same as were shipped on the car from the factory more than a year ago.

Captain Dougherty, during his encampment with the militia proved the feasibility of the automobile for use in army service. The captain has left for Yosemite Valley with his family. They made the trip in their Chalmers "30."

According to advices received by the Pioneer Automobile Company another perfect score for the Hudson was recorded in the three days' reliability run of the Cleveland News. A Hudson touring car, driven by William L. McCulla, led twenty-eight other cars over a hazardous 407 mile trail through Ohio.

Neal J. McKeon and Hugo Muller, both of the Hugo Muller Auto Co., have left for an extensive visit to the Moline and Premier factories in the East. The auto situation generally will be studied and arrangements made for 1911 season's allotments. In the absence of Muller and McKeon Chas. A. Davis, representative of the Premier factory, will take charge of the Muller business here.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Department No. 2, No. 22,256.

OGDEN MILLS as Executor of the Will of DARIUS OGDEN MILLS, Deceased, Plaintiff, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ogden Mills as Executor of the Will of Darius Ogden Mills, deceased, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

First Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred (100) feet southerly from the southeasterly corner of Golden Gate Avenue (formerly Tyler Street) and Octavia Street, and running thence southerly along the said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly one hundred (100) feet to the easterly line of Octavia Street and to the point of commencement; being a portion of Fifty Vara Lot Number Four (4) in Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152) of the Western Addition of said City and County of San Francisco.

Second Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet southerly from the southerly corner of Golden Gate Avenue (formerly Tyler Street) and Octavia Street, and running thence southerly along the said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly one hundred (100) feet to the easterly line of Octavia Street and to the point of commencement; being a portion of Fifty Vara Lot Number Four (4) in Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152) of the Western Addition of said City and County of San Francisco.

Third Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred and fifty (150) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Golden Gate Avenue with the easterly line of Octavia Street; running thence southerly along said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at right angles easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at right angles westerly one hundred (100) feet to the said easterly line of Octavia Street and point of commencement; being a portion of Western Addition Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that Ogden Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute and that their title to said property be established and quieted, subject only to the possession of plaintiff for the purposes of administration; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be met in the premises.

Another Boys' Book

The title of Warren L. Eldred's juvenile, "The Boys of Brookfield Academy," stamps it as another of the "Frats and Football" volumes, though it is decidedly better than the majority of its mates. Brookfield Academy had been at one time a crack preparatory school and relying on its former reputation and its prestige while he was a student there, Sydney Prescott, civil engineer, had entered his young brother Foster, of whom he was guardian, but now, returned from his business engagements at a distance and with leisure to examine into things, he found himself by no means pleased with either the boy's scholastic standing, or his morals and manners, and with his own old time comrade, Brewster Judson, he went down to pay the institution a visit and if possible discover what was wrong with the school, the boy or both. The two old pupils speedily found out that the whole place had a run-down appearance. There was only one of the old teachers left and he was well nigh discouraged. The principal seemed to regard his position as one which would afford him a livelihood while he carried on his own chosen vocations and the trustees were without special qualifications for their office, and appeared to have only one fixed rule, to keep on in the beaten track. The faculty was constantly changing, for there was neither honor nor glory to be gained by expending energy in a losing fight, and the attendance had dropped off fifty per cent and was still dwindling. The school was dominated by a fraternity, the DP, whose membership was limited to twenty, but which took in the mischievous element, the boys who were out for a good time regardless of consequences to any one but themselves, and Foster Prescott was one of the ring leaders of this choice coterie. Brewster Judson, who had been a leader of athletics in his day, both at Brookfield and at college, was inspired to attempt the regeneration of the old school, and to that end applied for and received the position of physical director, and the story, of course, deals with his up-hill fight against the DP and his eventual success when Brookfield through the medium of its athletics, is once more in the front rank of preparatory institutions. One has no fault to find with Mr. Eldred. He has refrained from glorifying the lawlessness and presenting his unlucky cubs in the light of martyrs to the persecutions of trustees and faculty, but there are a lot of old fogies, survivals from former generations, who would like to see just one school, in fiction or in fact, given over to what used to be considered the legitimate reason for the maintenance of schools. They have some doubts of the fatalities attendant on a reasonable amount of application to grammars and spelling books, and surely it would not require any greater courage to devote a little time to history and geography than it does to join a "poison squad" and take chances on strange chemicals. It ought not to take any greater heroism to learn a few pages of Latin than it does to master the intricacies of athletics rules, and once it is satisfactorily proved that reading, writing and mathematics are really more dangerous than dynamite, there would be an end to the everlasting demands that school boys should learn something. Won't somebody be brave enough to give it a trial? Lothrop, Lee and Shepard are the publishers of this volume

On New York Society

Ralph Pullitzer's "New York Society on Parade" is offered as the first book of its kind, but a generation ago George William Curtis treated the same subject in somewhat the same way, a general and comprehensive view, not a recital of personalities and scandals, and to those who recall the earlier work it will be apparent that the leisure class does not change greatly from one generation to another though the individuals, and for that matter, whole family connections drop out. "Society" as we understand it in America, means that class who have sufficient means to keep up a certain degree of expenditure and the inclination to follow or to try to lead their herd. For the greater part they are either newly rich, or wealth has come into the family so comparatively recently that they have no traditions of their own, so are driven to do exactly what "everybody" does. Mr. Pullitzer has confined his humorous observations to three phases of social display, the formal dinner, the opera and the ball. Somehow, despite all the show and extravagance, the glare and the glitter, and the heart-burning jealousy of the excluded, one is reminded of a bit of an old time ballad supposed to voice the sentiment of a convict at a treadmill:

"They've built us up a noble wall
To keep the vulgar out;
We've nothing in the world to do
But just to walk about."

For they really do not seem to be enjoying themselves a particle better than those who are under sentence of confinement. The men can talk stocks and the whole thing is a sort of exchange in which everyone hopes to profit. It is a weary, dreary picture, and one would suppose that those who are without the pale would be as heartily glad of it as is the citizen who is safe outside the walls of a penitentiary. Mr. Pullitzer's book is far from being as unsatisfactory as the society which he depicts. It is well written, bright and entertaining, and sarcastic. There are only a hundred and forty pages, small pages at that—with eight illustrations from paintings by Howard Chandler Christy. It is prettily bound and is one of the neatest little books of the year, quite attractive enough to have been made a holiday edition. From Harper and Brothers.

Justice for a Hootookatoo

Tardy justice is to be done to a Tibetan Hootookatoo, a high priest of Buddhism, who lost his head when he incurred the displeasure of the since deposed Dalai Lama, the religious head of the Buddhists, who fled from Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, last spring. He is to be reincarnated and his titles and wealth restored. The imperial edict, made public in the name of the Son of Heaven, sets forth that the Hootookatoo—that is, one of the saints of the highest class—was decapitated three years ago. The throne finds now that it was deceived by the Dalai Lama, who secured the execution on the ground that the high priest had attempted the former's life by sorcery, a profession in which these saints are reputed to be especially gifted. Recently the lesser Lamas memorialized the throne, divulging the fact that the Dalai Lama had sought to extort large sums of money from the Hootookatoo. Failing in his attempt at extortion, the religious ruler brought about the other's death. The process of reincarnation will be similar to that of a Dalai Lama. Infants of a certain blood displaying signs that they possess the same soul as did the deceased will be assembled and their names written upon slabs of wood and sealed. These will be placed in a large urn of precious metal, from which the High Lama will draw by chance one of the names. The choice will be greeted by the populace with shouts of joy. The edict further provides that the sainthood of the Hootookatoo shall be restored and that his treasure confiscated by the Dalai Lama shall be returned to the infant Hootookatoo. A Regency of Lamas will act for the reincarnated one until his maturity.

Guest—Where's Mrs. Frost tonight?
Hostess—Oh, she's at home, trying to hush things up.
Guest—Husband, scandal, or children?

Mrs. Younglove—What do you think of my biscuits, dear?
Hubby—I never give an offhand opinion on weighty subjects, my love.

CHALMERS MOTOR CARS

Have Arrived and Are Now on Exhibition

The Chalmers "30" is the only medium priced car that was ever awarded the Glidden Trophy.

Never before has a car costing under $4000 won a Glidden Trophy.

This year---the longest, hardest and most racking route ever undertaken---the Trophy was awarded to the Chalmers "30" in competition with cars of more than twice its price and rated power.

What more could you ask of any car at any price?

With such a proof of its sturdy and reliable qualities, the demand for 1911 models is going to be even greater than last year, when the output was sold before the season was half over.

This increased demand will not affect the Chalmers policy of building cars of quality, not quantity.

Not how many cars, but how good, is our constant aim and effort.

This is the principal reason for the fact that the Chalmers has never been defeated in any motoring event by any car of its price and power class.

1911 models are being delivered in order of purchase.

Demonstration of new models by appointment.

The Primary Lesson

We were told by the authors and advocates of the direct primary that it would destroy the power of political machines. But we have seen that it does nothing of the kind. The only complete piece of machinery operated in the recent campaign was that of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, and it achieved a great triumph for one of the factions of the Republican party. The League nominated a ticket, and gave it systematic and intelligent support. It met with nothing but confused, unorganized opposition. The old machine that gave us the present State Administration presented no ticket to the people in any authoritative manner. The Administration itself was not united against the League. Many voters in sympathy with the old machine were not certain as to how it should be expressed. Furthermore none of the party leaders opposed to the Lincoln-Roosevelt League faction took part in the campaign. Even the opposition press was disorganized. And the consequence of all of which was that the machine, the only machine in operation, was successful. By reason of the lesson that has been taught aspirants for office will hereafter appreciate the importance of being nominated by a convention before seeking nomination at the hands of the people, and notwithstanding the spirit of the direct primary independence in politics will find that it is far from being its own reward.

The Unsophisticated Colonel

Colonel Roosevelt is reported to be very much amazed and greatly astonished at the reports attributing to him hostility to the Taft Administration. With all his experience as a practical politician, in spite of his genius for designing and executing policies, and his clairvoyant instinct for opportunity, his supreme excellence is simplicity, which is so profound that it is sometimes mistaken for perverse craft. So like the dove, without the tiniest quality of the serpent in his composition, his very artlessness takes on the color of dissimulation. How utterly unsophisticated the Colonel really is everybody must realize by reason of his astonishment at the misapprehension that has arisen with respect to his attitude toward the Administration of his protege. Not for a moment has it ever occurred to him that his friendly relations with the avowed enemies of Mr. Taft might be misjudged. He supposed that everybody would understand that his was the benign purpose of abating jangling discords and producing sweetest harmonies. It never occurred to him that in assuming the role of dictator of party affairs and presuming to act as censor of the morals of the Administration, while at the same time taking into his confidence and retaining the men who were openly trying to embarrass President Taft and by underhanded methods giving verisimilitude to mischievous gossip, he might be suspected of sinister motives. The Colonel is a paragon of ingenuousness and simplicity. It is astonishing that he doesn't sometimes suspect himself.

The Party Split

At this time the nature of the relations existing between President Taft and Colonel Roosevelt is known to but few men. That something like a crisis has been impending we may be reasonably certain, and notwithstanding the President's amiable attitude in his letter to Lloyd Griscom we have reason to doubt that it can be averted. There are indications of a disposition on the part of the President to conciliate and placate his predecessor, to gratify his whims in order to secure his hearty support, but the probability is that to go the full distance demanded it will be necessary for him to forfeit more of his self-respect than he would care to dispense with. Though the outcome is a matter of great interest it may not have any pronounced effect on the Republican party. If Mr. Roosevelt has not wrecked his party he has at least impaired its machinery and prestige to an extent possibly beyond his or President Taft's power of reconstruction. The party is split wide open. Nothing but Time can heal the sores that have been salted. But perhaps Mr. Roosevelt still has sufficient magnetism to lead the cohorts to victory. Perhaps with that prescience for which he is distinguished he has foreseen irresistible potentialities in the present situation, which may be as gratifying to him as it is distracting to most of the confused and confounded party leaders. Nevertheless the situation has its charms for certain optimistic leaders of Democracy who have been religiously pressing forward to imaginary points of bliss with the ceaseless hope of being politically blest.

The Sacrificing of Cannon

The supposition is that the Hon. Nicholas Longworth sounded authoritatively a new keynote for the purposes of the campaign when he announced the alienation of his affections from that grizzled object of insurgent hatred, the profane and defiant Uncle Joe Cannon. Poor old Uncle Joe! The insurgents have not insisted in vain that his bald head be served to them on a charger. He must be sacrificed for what is conceived to be the best interest of his party. The fiat has gone forth bearing two seals, one from Oyster Bay, the other from Beverly, and Uncle may as well accept his doom gracefully. The frost has come, the blushing honors so lately borne are all wilted, and Uncle Joe who served not his God with half the zeal he served the Administration is left naked to his enemies, a forlorn scapegoat to whose shorn hide the wind that fills the sails of trimmers will not be tempered. Uncle Joe has been sacrificed on the altar of political expediency. But will the sacrifice appease the wrath of the insurgent gods? If so we must conclude they are easily mollified. For after all when Uncle Joe is considered in the calm, gray dawn of the morning after, he doesn't loom up as a monster of frightful mien. True he is the incarnation of standpat politics, but what has he done aside from disagreeing with them to deserve the oburgations of his enemies? The principles he has stood for are those that have received the approval of the party in power. If those principles are detestable they should be disavowed along with Uncle Joe. To repudiate the veteran Speaker at this time merely for political expediency without a confession to that effect, thus justifying the inference that the attacks of the insurgents have been inspired wholly by concern for the public welfare, is, to say the least, pusillanimous and cruel.

An Aphorism Interpreted

No man is a hero to his own valet. This like all good aphorisms while it embodies a detached truth expresses a general principle, and is therefore applicable in a wider sense than is usually given it. So imaginative a man as Goethe saw nothing in it but the obvious and observed, "Of course not, a man must be a hero to understand a hero." Thus, even a great poet, nodding at times, utters sublimated nonsense. As a matter of fact a hero is very rarely a hero to a hero, for the same reason that the augurs in ancient Rome laughed in one another's faces. Seneca who understood human nature better than Goethe had the correct view of the matter as we have learned from his observation, "Take away ambition and vanity and where will our heroes and patriots be." And if Seneca had lived in our day he would have added, "Take what you read in our newspapers about our public men with a grain of salt and there will be fewer heroes in the world." The truth of which is to be perceived through reflection on the number of popular idols whose feet of clay are being exposed from day to day. The grandest of heroic deeds, as some poet has said, are those which are performed within four walls and in domestic privacy. The performers of these deeds are seldom to be found appealing to the imagination of the populace. But to return to our aphorism. No man is a hero to his own valet for the same reason that a prophet is sometimes without honor save in his own country and in his own home. In other words they by whom a man is best known are the least likely to have their judgment of him impaired by illusions. Of course they may have it impaired by envy or some one of the other qualities of human nature that affect our intellectual vision when we look narrowly into the conduct of men; but there is never any danger of a man's neighbors placing a too high appraisal on his character. Nevertheless a man's neighbors are generally regarded as pretty good authority when an estimate of him is required for any purpose. And hence it is that in politics a candidate for office, even though successful, experiences a feeling of deep humiliation if he has failed to carry his own precinct. It pains him to realize that his reputation is like seedwheat which thrives best when brought from a distance. Therefore the probability is there was some bitterness in the cup of joy that was drunk by the Hon. Hiram Johnson when he read the election returns. For while this illustrious patriot swept the whole State he was badly beaten in his own precinct. His own neighbors repudiated him. He did not receive one-fourth of the votes cast in the precinct. Furthermore he received a trouncing in his own city. It is evident that Mr. Johnson has been too closely scrutinized at home. It was here where his personality was inspected at close range that he was metamorphosed over night. It was here that he espoused the ideals which gave him distinction and opened a channel to the plethoric purse of our only pure and incorruptible millionaire. Here the seed of his civic patriotism took root in susceptible soil and sprouted between two days. The burgeoning of Johnson into a reformer was a phenomenon witnessed with astonishment in San Francisco long before the almost incredible news penetrated those remote corners of the State where his name is now a household word. But it is evident that he is a prophet unappreciated in his own parish, a circumstance, happily for him, of no consequence to the farmers, the rural editors and the baccolic cognoscenti who look down with compassion on the benighted citizenry of the metropolis, and marvel at the prodigious stupidity of the unsophisticated purchasers of gold bricks that predominate in an incorrigible community. For it is not for them in all their superb wisdom to apprehend the principle of the aphorism—No man is a hero to his own valet.

Sinclair's Symposium

Upton Sinclair is in London nursing his passion for the establishment of either "a public or private endowment of men and women who have shown signs of great literary talent." For the purpose of getting expressions of opinion on the merits of the project he is conducting a symposium in The New Age, a London Socialist weekly, to which some prominent literary men have contributed their views. As might have been expected these writers are not of one opinion. Some of them think the project a good thing, others pronounce it impracticable and not at all likely to add to our store of literary treasure. Naturally those that are most heartily in favor of the project are poets; for poets are seldom endowed with anything more than their imagination. The Sinclair idea appeals strongly to Edwin Markham, whose sympathy for the man with the plectrum is not less profound than that which has been excited in him by the man with the hoe. In his opinion a steady income would "tend to give dignity to poetry and hope to poets"; also, "it would add to the ideal element in our civilization." We find Bliss Carman also approving the endowment project. He credits Mr. Sinclair "with a noble purpose," and he says that "the plight of bewildered and struggling genius is a disgrace to us all." When we come to consult hard-headed novelists and essayists who have made money with their pen we find that there are many objections to the scheme. William James, who says that his brother Henry is too ill to write but endorses his sentiments, expresses the opinion that "a young man whose talent cannot find any recognition from editors or publishers in this day of lively competition seems hardly worth encouraging." Furthermore it seems to him that in our scribbling age what is publicly needed is "some kind of machinery for suppressing literary production rather than for stimulating it." Charles Edward Russell says that "to encourage the writing of fiction is unnecessary because we don't need any more fiction." H. G. Wells doesn't think well of the scheme because of the futility of trying to select the right kind of judges. He suggests that Mr. Sinclair should consider the way the Nobel prizes are being distributed and also the life-long exclusions from the French Academy." Frederick Van Eeden endorses the plan, but testifies from experience that "neglect, misunderstanding and also material worry and need, however hard and unpleasant, serve to acquire a strength and independence that could not have been reached otherwise." And he asks: "Would men like Defoe, Dickens, Carlyle, Meredith, de Balzac, have written better if they were always kept free from struggle?" So far Mr. Sinclair has not received much encouragement from literary genius. Nevertheless his symposium may bear fruit. We have many philanthropists looking about them for worthy objects of assistance, and some of them may be induced to give ear to the man who wrote "The Jungle." We hope Mr. Sinclair will have the pleasure of realizing his dream. Not because we have any enthusiasm for the development of mute, inglorious Miltons, but because we should like to see our millionaires giving their surplus coin to struggling individuals rather than to struggling universities and futile propaganda. The notion that genius is going to seed for want of cultivation is not in our opinion worthy of serious thought. We believe with John Foster that "the strongest characteristic of genius is the power of lighting its own fire," and also with Will mott who tells us "it finds its own road and carries its own lamp."

An Ideal Journal

Boston has a new newspaper. It is called "The Boston Common." The capital was furnished by one hundred and thirty-nine citizens who have agreed to give the paper absolute freedom from partisanship and sectarianism and to make it in every sense an independent journal concerned for nothing but the public interest. We are told that public affairs will be discussed always from the standpoint of the public interest, and that nothing but the truth will be printed. The new paper is animated by a noble purpose, fidelity to which should insure success. But there is one serious difficulty to be overcome in striving for the realization of the ideals to which these Boston publishers have devoted themselves. It is the difficulty of determining just what truth is and by what means the public interest may be advanced. The counterfeits of truth are constantly being imposed on mankind, and the most destructive of principles are founded on truth. What appears to be the public interest today may prove to be the public folly tomorrow. Where have we an infallible judge of the public interest? Is the truth to be ascertained by counting noses? We read of but one wise man, and all that he knew was that he knew nothing. The Boston Common, in our opinion, will not be able to live up to its principles. What it will find especially difficult is to avoid partisanship while judging of, and insisting upon, the things that are conducive to the public interest. Every newspaper that has convictions is a partisan. But there is nothing discreditable in newspaper partisanship, provided it be honest. The most discreditable characteristic of American journalism today is its intolerance of opinion, and this intolerance is nowhere so marked as among those journalists who are most zealous for the public interest. While there is much need for more freedom from evil influence and for more scrupulous devotion to the truth, there is also much need for calmness of judgment, for charity and for generosity. These are the things that we should like to see The Boston Common propagate. As Jefferson has said "error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." Nowadays reason must have considerable courage to assert itself. We have very little of that free expression of opinion which Gladstone pronounced the safety-valve of passion. The men that consider their opinions of more value than their arguments have secured almost a monopoly of the field of controversy by methods of discussion that self-respecting persons scorn to adopt.

Perspective Impressions

"I didn't do it," says President Taft. And his voice sounds as though he has a frog in his throat.

President Taft has established a branch of the Ananias Club with Vice-President Sherman as the first charter member.

From the Colonel's latest sermon we learn that he is still unwavering in his conviction that it is good to be good and bad to be bad.

"La Follette never followed any man," says the Anaconda Standard. But he has chased many a job.

The first Western Pacific train came through this week amid general rejoicing. Now let us look forward to the first cinch bill.

Mrs. "Jack" Cudahy is said to be thinking of going into vaudeville. Perhaps her ambition is to elevate the stage.

The indications now are that it is the regulars' turn to be read out of the Republican party. And all the while the Democrats are getting together.

We are told that the great heart of the State throbbed with emotion when the first Western Pacific train crossed the borders of our commonwealth. Now let us see what the great heart of the State will do when the first flamboyant anti-Western Pacific demagogue urges us to tear up the tracks.

Changes in the Legislature

As a Result of the Primary Election Some of the Best Known Members of the State Legislature Have Been Relegated to Private Life

By The Politician

Not for many years has an election in California worked so many changes in the personnel of the State Legislature as did the primary of last week. Of course we must wait for the result of the general election in November to determine who will be the eighty members of the Assembly and the twenty new members of the Senate, but meanwhile it is interesting to note the names of the men who have been eliminated from the legislative race by direct primary defeats. The list includes some of the best known men in both chambers of the State Legislature. The next State Senate will consist almost entirely of men who will be serving either the first half or the second half of their first term. The Assembly will be without some of the men who have been accustomed to direct its affairs, men whose influence on legislation sprang either from their personal weight or their experience in legislative procedure. This condition will have its effect in the business of the next law-making body and it is quite possible that the absence of the men who knew how to keep the wheels moving smoothly and swiftly will result in the doing of a smaller amount of work than usual.

In the Senate the man who will be most missed is Frank Leavitt of Oakland. Leavitt served for twelve years in the Senate and before that was in the Assembly for one year. A man of strong mentality and great physical force he left his impress on legislation from the beginning. He had a great capacity for work and of all the men in the Senate he alone kept track of everything which was done on the floor or in committee. To those who are familiar with legislative business this gives the measure of his assimilative powers. Leavitt was an organization man and took program, as the saying is, from alpha to omega. In fact he and Senator Wolfe of San Francisco were known as the wheel-horses of the machine. In debate he was blunt, blustering, slangy at ordinary times; but on certain occasions his unpolished sentences contained more real eloquence than the carefully considered periods of the orators. He was one of the few men who dared to stand against the popular opinion that called for the passage of the anti-race-track bill and he fought the direct primary bill tooth and nail. On the other hand he leaves his mark on the improved banking and insurance legislation of the State. None will miss Leavitt more than the raw members who were accustomed to go to him for counsel as to the intricacies of legislative procedure. Machine men and reformers, they put absolute trust in his word and his advice. He came nearer to being the Aldrich of the State Senate than any man who sat in that body. It was largely owing to the complications of the Curry fight in Alameda County that he went down to defeat before a tyro in politics.

Those who weighed the mentality of the various State senators during the last session used to say that Ed Miller of Visalia was the ablest man in the Legislature and perhaps they were right. Being a democrat, however—he defeated Truxtun Beale four years ago—he did not exercise anything like the power which he would have wielded as a member of the dominant party. Of all the democratic senators he was the one most respected by the republicans because he devoted himself strictly to his legislative duties and never tried to do Bourbon politics or to make Bourbon grandstand plays. Miller's mind had been cultivated by close application to law and he had a natural aptitude for debate, so he won a position in the Senate which, considering that he belonged to an almost negligible minority, was remarkable. During the debate on the direct primary law he electrified the Senate with a peroration of intense yet simple eloquence such as had not been heard for years in that chamber of pretentious orators. Probably the reason was that Miller was not trying to be eloquent—he was simply speaking with sincerity the things that he felt very deeply. The reciprocal demurrage bill was one of Miller's achievements in the last Legislature, but there is no way of estimating the amount of work he did in the finance committee by eliminating unconstitutional provisions from bills and correcting the extravagances of his radical confreres. Miller considered for a while the advisability of entering the gubernatorial race against Bell and when he decided to stay out of it, principally on account of ill health, he refused to be a candidate for the Senate. In him the Democrats lose a tower of strength.

The combined intellects of the three senators from San Francisco who were eliminated recently would not weigh much in any body of men. Gus Hartman, Marc Anthony and Dan Reily were not constructive statesmen. Gus Hartman was the licensed jester of the Senate. Aside from obeying the bidding of the machine to which he owed his elevation he was not expected to do anything except to make the rest of the senators laugh when they were tired with the cares of State. His speeches were invariably convulsing; his capacity for crying on the wrong scent almost amounted to genius; and the next Senate will be infinitely duller for his absence. Marc Anthony enlivened the proceedings of the Senate after a different fashion; he introduced the weirdest bills of any man who ever sat there. If he had had his way the State militia would long ago have marched on Tokio and a Japanese in San Francisco would have been more of a rarity than the dodo. Yet Marc Anthony was the mildest-mannered senator that ever urged the slitting of a yellow throat. It was said of him that no man ever knew where he lodged in Sacramento; that nobody had ever seen him anywhere in Sacramento except within the walls of the capitol; and even that he rented two or three different lodgings in order that he might insure absolute isolation. Certainly nobody could ever find him when the Senate was not in session. It was as though the earth swallowed him when he stepped out of the Senate elevator. Anthony caused the famous deadlock on the direct primary bill by voting with the reformers, his stand having been taken after a newspaper correspondent advised him to stick to his post like a soldier. Having fought in the Philippines Anthony was impressed by the simile and all the machine's horses and all the machine's men, including John C. Lynch and P. H. McCarthy, could not swerve him from his position. Senator Dan Reily hardly ever took an active part in legislation. He just voted.

Down in Los Angeles two great characters have been eliminated from the Senate. These are Bill Savage of San Pedro and "Alphabetical" McCartney. Bill Savage was the most ferocious man in the Senate. During the last session he assaulted a Los Angeles newspaperman for daring to criticize him and then arose to a question of personal privilege and applied all the epithets he could think of to E. T. Earl of the Los Angeles Express. On another famous occasion he declared that he was an Indian and never forgot or forgave an injury; thereafter he figured in many cartoons with a feather in his hair. Every time he had a grievance he exploited it on the floor as a question of personal privilege and as he fought through two sessions to prevent the annexation of San Pedro to Los Angeles he was full of grievances. A mighty irascible old man was Bill Savage.

"Alphabetical" McCartney was far from irascible on ordinary occasions but he too assaulted a Los Angeles newspaperman and as he chose to do it one night when Lincoln Steffens was present in the Senate he got a good deal of publicity. But McCartney's greatest claim to fame lies in the fact that he put his mother-in-law on the payroll as a porter. When the newspapers ventilated that exploit McCartney was the laughing-stock of the State and was ashamed to show his face in public for some time. It was a touching instance of family devotion but a scurrilous world refused to take it seriously.

Willis of San Bernardino whom Charlie Belshaw nicknamed "the mocking bird from San Berdoo" is another eccentric who will be missed in the next Senate. Willis signalized his first term in the Senate by putting the town of Skidoo on the map, that having been the place of his abiding before he sought a theater of greater activities in Redlands. Poor Willis was afflicted with a mania for oratory and would declaim as long as the long-suffering Senate would listen to him. He did what Dogberry longed to have done more frequently than any man who ever sat in the Legislature (see Act IV, scene 2). The newspapermen were very grateful for Willis, because he was good for copy every time he opened his mouth. When the next Legislature convenes they will watch expectantly for the man who is to take his place.

The remaining two senators who will not return to Sacramento are Clem Bates of Oakland and old Abner Weed of Siskiyou. Neither took an active part in legislation.

In the Assembly two former speakers will be missed next session—"Bob" Beardslee of Stockton, one of the most popular men in the lower house, and Phil Stanton, one of the least popular. Beardslee was thinking for a while of being a candidate for lieutenant-governor and if he had entered the race, he would undoubtedly have been a formidable man to beat. When he changed his mind about running he decided to stay in Stockton and devote himself to the practice of law. He knew the ways of legislation better than most of his confreres and he prepared the last budget in a masterly manner. He will be greatly missed by the old-timers who return to Sacramento. Grove Johnson, the veteran of the Assembly, is another who will not be seen in the next Assembly. That body will not seem the same when his high-pitched voice and his whiskers are there no more. Gone too are Jake Transue of Los Angeles, a legislative fighter who has taken and given blows on many a hard-fought question, and Ed Baxter of Yosemite, a man as well known in the valley as in the capital. It is interesting also to note that Frank Otis of Oakland who introduced the anti-race track bill and Ed Callan of San Francisco who gave sixty-three reasons for voting against Senator Perkins, have been eliminated. But they were not old-timers.

"We were rivals in a love affair."

"And you were the victor?"

"No, I married the girl."

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over.

The Depopulation of Ireland

France has come to be so distinctly looked upon as the classic home of stationary population that the tendency has been to overlook the only European nation that has experienced actual depopulation during the course of the nineteenth century. That nation is Ireland. In 1841 the population of that island was 8,175,124. Within ten years it had dropped to a little over 6,552,000. The succeeding decades showed no such enormous decrease, but the ratio was high enough. For the ten-year periods up to 1901 the average annual loss of population was, successively, 75,000, 38,000, 23,000, 47,000 and 34,000. With the turn of the century, a notable change came about. Figures laid before the House of Commons by Mr. Birrell just before the adjournment of the present Parliament showed that in 1902-3 the population loss was about 18,000. In 1903 came the enactment of the sweeping Wyndham land purchase bills, and from that year till 1908 the annual loss was, successively, 11,000, 11,000, 3,000, 11,000, and 6,000. The year 1908-09 was a red-letter year in Irish history. In that year there was an actual increase of 115 souls in the population of Ireland. The draining process of sixty years had been checked. There has been some difference of opinion as to the degree of success that has attended the latest phase of British land policy in Ireland. That it has been beneficial, no one has seriously denied. Even allowing for possible annual fluctuation, there can be no doubt that the outflow of population from Ireland has been stopped.

A Japanese Explorer

The Japanese are about to enter the field of polar exploration. Lieutenant Shirafi of the Japanese navy has fitted out a small expedition and proposes to compete in the race for the south pole. With a party of fifteen men and with fifteen Manchurian ponies to draw his sledges he will sail from Japan on a schooner of 250 tons for King Edward VII. Land where he plans to spend the next Antarctic winter. In the Spring he will make a dash for the south pole. The Japanese should make good explorers for they have recently made great progress in geographical research, land surveys and mapping. The maps they are producing of Japan, Corea and parts of Manchuria would be a credit to any nation. In addition to technical skill they have courage, endurance and dogged determination. Lieutenant Shirafi may yet be hailed as the Peary of the Antarctic.

The Liquor Question in Hawaii

By a vote of more than three to one, the Territory of Hawaii, which recently went through the throes of a sharp contest on the liquor question has decided against the proposed law which would prohibit all manufacture or sale of intoxicants. Every island returned a majority for the saloons, the total vote being 7,283, against 2,185. Just as in several of the Southern States, where the presence of the negroes induced thousands to vote for Statewide prohibition, consideration for the native element in Hawaii was the main argument of the "dry" campaign. The prohibitionists, however, made the mistake of entering the fight insufficiently organized, and were unable to cope with the methods which the liquor interests zealously employed to get voters to the polls. Yet good results have come from the campaign, for the saloon-keepers were forced to come out strongly in favor of the present excellent licensing law, and indications are that it will hereafter be enforced more strictly. Besides this, they voluntarily did away with the worst places in the Territory, and signed promises not to sell the cheaper brands of liquor. The overwhelming vote shows that Hawaii is not ready for prohibition, but the "drys" may feel that they have brought about better conditions throughout the islands.

A Church for Deaf Mutes

New York is to have a church for the exclusive use of deaf mutes. All the sermons and the announcements will be given in the sign language. The church will be built by the Jesuits and will be in charge of a priest who has devoted a great deal of his activities to ministrations among the unfortunate people who can neither speak nor hear.

No More Custom House Red Tape

Collector Loeb of the New York Custom House has cut the red tape of that institution in a manner hitherto unknown. It is no longer necessary for a man to go into the details of his wardrobe for the benefit of the government. Formerly the returning traveler had to fill out a blank form with a list of all the articles he had purchased or procured abroad, with their values. On the dock the inspector examined his baggage minutely to see whether he had told the truth in his declaration and the process took at least half an hour. Under the new system the returning traveler identifies his signature on a card containing his name, address and the value of his purchases. Then an inspector looks at the articles in question and chalks the baggage. The new system takes about five minutes.

Has the Mayor Alienated Union Labor?

Editor Town Talk—Dear Sir: I hope the fact has not escaped your attention that the Labor party did not obey orders at the primary election. Mayor McCarthy, as everybody knows, was for Alden Anderson. He sent out his lieutenants to whoop it up for Mr. Anderson, but it seems that the whooping didn't do any good. Are we not to infer that the union men have turned their backs on the Administration? I for one am inclined to think that such is the case.

San Francisco, August 22.

—A Union Man

A Optimistic Octogenarian

Editor Town Talk—Dear Sir: There is so much talk of degeneracy, so much sighing over the departure of the "good old times" that I would like a little space in your valuable paper, being an optimist, to say a few words about the halcyon days of the pregnant present. I am 83 years young, and I feel that if things continue on the mend I will live to see the millennium, which, with prophetic eye I can see just fifty years removed. The world is acquiring new smiles every day and chiefly for the reason that women are spreading their genial influence among us. Never in all the world's history has woman been so free from burdens, so exalted in privileges as today. This is the era of her coronation. She is now queen of herself and the world. When I was a boy women were punished by being publicly whipped on the back. In those days there was very little philanthropy in the world. More comfort, more purity, more intelligence, more refinement, more everything worth having—these mark the advance of our social life. Never were houses so good, never was dress so comfortable and healthful, never manners so simple and sensible, never the means of all enjoyment and development so common and so universally accessible as today. Even our public service has improved. In the "good old days" as they are called men lived under the horrid shadows of frightful superstitions. Science has emancipated them. Science has explained earthquakes and volcanoes and we no longer believe that devils are fighting in the bowels of the earth. Astronomy has shattered the follies of astrology. Croakers always have had a faculty for seeing "breakers ahead" and smooth waters behind. But I know from experience that never was the ship of human hope in better trim, never was there a fairer, broader sea ahead. Let us then see things as they are. Let us felicitate ourselves on our lot. Let us appreciate our prosperity, or at least reflect that if there was a time when we were better off than we are today it was but a few years ago, just before some of us were seized with a mania for improving our lot, for gilding refined gold, and throwing a perfume on the violet.

Sincerely yours,

—Luter V. Howard.

A Letter from Mrs. Mighels

Editor Town Talk—Dear Sir: Reading Town Talk of last week I took note of your comment anent the Chronicle paragraph, relating to spinal complaint producing brilliancy of brain. I did not use the word "complaint" at all. They made me say what I did not say in more instances than one; example: "All men are alike but some are actors," which is absurd. What I did say is from a deep experience and a long thinking trying to comprehend "Man" in all his splendor, all his majesty and all his contrariness—

"All men are alike only some are better actors."

Some can conceal their crudeness and savagery while other cannot. They all are actors—from high to low—but some are poor at the histrionic art. About the spinal mistake, I said "injury"! I know a few things! I know that spinal injuries, even slight ones, affect the brain. I believe that every man from "over-doing" has more or less put his spine out of alignment. That that is the reason he is so queer and so irritated—and why he has to smoke—and to swear—and to drink and to go to prize-fights and to gamble and to do all sorts of mysterious things for which there is no explanation. I think if John Jacob Astor had his spine set straight that that tragedy of our American social life would be wiped off of the slate forever. This belief of mine was given to the world first by Judge Graham. Since then I have received most pitiful letters asking me for further advice how to proceed. Already I know of several who have regained the mastery—meanwhile the gallant press of today takes its jibe at me. I am willing, however, to bear it all if thereby one man can arise and gain the mastery over himself once more.

San Francisco, August 23.

Very sincerely yours,

—Aunt Ella Sterling,

An Interrupted Idyl

By Antonio Fogazzaro (From the Italian)

At Oria, on the shore of Lake Lugano, I have a small wave-washed villa, at the foot of a hill covered with olive, vine and laurel—laurel which no poet before me has cared to pluck.

It is a fair, quiet corner of the world, dear to artists and dreamers. When there I spend a good part of each day alone in my boat, in boatman's garb, with a book and my fishing-tackle. This habit of mine was the means of bringing me, many years ago, the most romantic adventure of my life.

One day I was about to land near the two rocks facing Lugano—at that time a wild and deserted strip of shore—at the entrance of a shady little valley leading to a silvery waterfall. I had fished all morning and had broken my line without catching so much as a minnow, so I got out of my boat and sat down in the shade to mend my line.

I had been there only a few minutes when, high up, above the waterfall, I heard the gruff voice of a man and little shrieks of laughter, as if there were ladies making their way down with difficulty. Looking up, I saw a little girl warily picking her own way down the steep slope above the waterfall and giving a helping hand to a young girl of about seventeen, who was carrying a basket. Last came an elderly gentleman, grumbling much and clutching at every bush for support. When they reached the waterfall they took out some sandwiches, wine and fruit from the basket, and prepared to enjoy their luncheon. The gentleman, a stout man with a red nose and gray whiskers, seemed annoyed at my presence; but the elder girl, after a rapid glance, said carelessly, "A fisherman."

I was somewhat discomfited and felt my color rising. They paid no further attention to me, and began to eat and talk gaily. I, who usually have some difficulty in understanding English, was surprised at the distinctness with which these people spoke, especially the young lady who had called me a fisherman. She was a very pretty girl, lithe and tall, with brown hair and bright, blue eyes. I cannot describe her dress, but I know that she had a bunch of cyclamen at her belt and that her hands were exquisite.

I was a romantic fellow in those days, ready to see a passionate soul and a treasure of love in every pair of beautiful eyes that met my own. The young lady had glanced at me but once, and then with some disdain, but this only inflamed my imagination; and as I looked again and again at the delicate features and dainty person of the disdainful lady, I was seized with a desire to make an impression upon her by displaying my breeding and my English.

As soon as the elderly gentleman had swallowed sandwiches enough he began to speak of their return to Lugano, declaring that he would not climb the hill again. And yet there was no other way to reach the village of Caprino, where the steamer for Lugano stops.

What if the fisherman should step up with a lordly air and a gentle smile and say in English, "You need a boat, madam, and a fisherman as boatman? May I have the pleasure of rowing you over 'the cool mirror of the glassy lake?'" No, it would be too absurd; and if the young lady should laugh in my face, what then? Might one perhaps reply, "Do you know, madam, that I am quoting Byron?" Absurder still. I gathered up my fishing-tackle, carried it to the boat, hid a volume of Heine I had with me and then returned, approached the elderly gentleman, and, touching my cap, asked in Italian if he wanted a boat for Lugano. He looked at his elder daughter, who explained what I had said. He seemed delighted and answered at once, "Yes, yes, Lugano."

"Let us look at the boat first, papa," said the young lady, in her sweet voice. "I don't care much for fishing boats; they are so dirty. Perhaps it smells of fish!"

Bitter irony! When I had had such confoundingly bad luck with my fishing!

The little girl meanwhile had darted down to the shore and called, "Harriet, Harriet!" There was only one boat on the shore and that must be mine; there could be no mistake. Miss Harriet was greatly surprised to see that it was an elegant oak boat with leather cushions and not the slightest odor of fish.

"Ask him the price, Harriet," said the old gentleman; "the boatmen here are such robbers."

But Miss Harriet answered, "I don't think this one is a robber. He looks like an honest man." Then, turning to me, she said, with the most adorable English accent, "A Lugano! Quanto?"

She blushed slightly at speaking Italian, and it was such a delight to watch her that I stood quite a while without answering. Then I said hurriedly, at haphazard, "Fifty centesimi."

"How much does he want?" said the father. "Tell him it's too much."

"But it isn't too much, papa; it's a mere trifle—less than a dime."

They stepped into the boat, and, while I did not specially enjoy helping the gentleman with the red nose, I had, by way of recompense, the pleasure of holding Miss Harriet's dainty hand in mine for one moment. The little girl jumped in without assistance.

The lake was as smooth as glass. Ordinarily it takes but half an hour to row from Cavallino to Lugano, but I admit that I did not hurry. No one paid any attention to me, and I could watch Miss Harriet at my ease. I thought I was already in love with her. I thought I would gladly go on rowing for a month to whisper a word in that little pink ear and be listened to—for a year to imprint a kiss upon that soft cheek and not be repulsed; for a whole lifetime to have a touch of those sweet lips and touch them in return.

"Confound it!" growled the old gentleman, while I was absorbed in this geometrical progression. "At this rate we shall reach Lugano tomorrow. Tell the good-for-nothing fellow to row faster, Harriet."

Miss Harriet, to my great delight, answered that the lake was delightful and Lugano tiresome. Then she asked me the name of the steep peak above Valsolda.

"The Peak of Cressogno," I answered. "Cressogno? What does Cressogno mean?"

She could not understand my reply, and her sister laughed. Then I said in French, with a smile, "Cressogno c'est le nom du village que vous voyez la-bas."

Miss Harriet looked at me in surprise, and I hastened to explain that I had been a boatman on Lake Geneva.

The conversation grew animated. The old gentleman did not know a word of French, little Miss Bertha not much more, but Miss Harriet spoke it very well. She asked many questions about the mountain and the lake, and I, in my efforts to be entertaining, forgot the part I was playing, and discoursed more like an author than a boatman. I pointed out Oria in the distance and told her that in one of those wave-washed villas at the foot of the hill, covered with the olive and the vine, lived a young Italian poet; that I often rowed him on the lake and how I enjoyed it, especially when the lake was stormy. Then I described the wild beauty of the storms, the fury of the foaming waves, the changing hues of mountain and lake, the lights on the Peak of Cressogno.

"Harriet," said the old gentleman, "what is 'to row' in Italian?"

"Remare," she said.

He turned to me and said, "Remare, remare!" I could not help laughing, and the two girls laughed with me.

The father flew into a passion, scolded them and called me an impertinent fellow.

For several minutes no one dared to speak, and I rowed with all my might. The little girl kept looking at me very inquiringly, but I had not the good luck to encounter a glance from Miss Harriet. Apparently she was avoiding my eyes.

Bertha was the first to break the silence, saying, almost in a whisper, "I think he's very intelligent."

"Perhaps he is," answered her father. "He is certainly a great talker, and certainly very homely."

It gave me a world of pleasure to listen to this dialogue and the discussion that followed, especially as it led Miss Harriet to send several looks at me.

"A regular boatman," said the father. "His ears are as big as sails."

Then he made the cruel discovery that I looked like "our Jack." Who was "our Jack"? I wondered.

The girls protested so vigorously that I began to suspect that Jack was a chimpanzee. The little girl defended me with the most warmth. Miss Harriet mildly criticized nature's handiwork as shown in my physiognomy, said that, on the whole, I was rather good-looking, and that there was something at once attractive and puzzling about me.

I hardly knew what to do or where to turn, and was mortally afraid of betraying myself.

When we approached Lugano, I asked Miss Harriet where she wished to land. "Vila Ceresio," she answered. Would they perhaps desire my services for some excursion the next day? Miss Bertha was evidently pleased with the suggestion, but the father seemed disinclined to engage me as boatman.

"Please, pap!" the child begged. "Such a pretty little boat!" She seemed on the verge of tears.

Miss Harriet asked me what excursion I would suggest. I proposed that we start from Lugano at nine in the morning, leave the boat at San Mamette, take a walk through the beautiful Valsolda, return to San Mamette for luncheon and then back to Lugano.

The old gentleman hesitated. "If we could get the Robertses to join us," he said.

"Yes, let's go with the Robertses," exclaimed the little girl.

Miss Harriet seemed annoyed but said nothing. I entered a silent protest against the company of these inconvenient Roberts people.

By this time we were very near the villa. Miss Bertha suddenly clapped her hands and cried out, "There they are! There are the Robertses!"

Her father seemed pleased, but Miss Harriet muttered something I could not catch. When we landed Miss Bertha sprang out at once and assisted her father, while I asked Miss Harriet whether I was to come for them the next day.

She said she thought so. She put a fifty centesimi piece on one of the cushions, and as she did so caught sight of my Heine, which had

The Spectator

The Reticence of a Famous Cit.

Though not a best seller "Who's Who In America" is one of the most entertaining specimens of current literature. Almost exclusively autobiographical it affords some interesting studies in the vanity of man. In this fat volume compact of small type are thousands of personal sketches through the medium of which we are enabled to glimpse the innermost thoughts of men regarding their own achievements. For example from one of the back members we learn that Judge William P. Lawlor, who congratulated both Johnson and Bell on the same night, can recall nothing in all his skyrocket career with so much satisfaction as the scattering votes that he received for the United States Senate from a few amiable Democrats in a Republican legislature. In the very latest number of "Who's Who," just out, we are permitted an X-ray inspection of the Hon. Francis J. Heney, and the self-appraisal revealed is somewhat surprising. From certain irrefutable data therein it is evident that Mr. Heney threw on the light after he separated himself from the Spreckels leg and yet he carefully sequestered the fact that he was connected with the graft prosecution. He mentions as the crowning glory of his career the part that he played in prosecuting the land fraud cases in Oregon. Are we to infer that Mr. Heney is accessible to shame, and hopes that his later activities will be forgotten? Be the fact as it may Mr. Heney is singularly reticent on the subject of his most strenuous and patriotic endeavors, while his old associate "Muley" Langdon breaks into "Who's Who" on the strength of nothing but his connection with the enterprise that his distinguished subordinate eliminates from his record. "Muley" we learn takes the credit to himself of having convicted Schmitz and Ruef. But what is more astonishing is that Mr. Rudolph Spreckels, our foremost citizen, has not been admitted to this aristocracy of talent which includes his two less famous brothers Adolph and John D. If the editors don't watch out Rudie will give them opposition with a Who's Who of his own and exploit himself as the whoest of all the who's.

The Natives' Beauty Contest

Let me lose no time in extending my congratulations to Miss Grace Smith who has been chosen Queen of the approaching Native Son celebration. Miss Smith is a very popular young lady—that was evidenced by the one hundred and ninety odd thousand votes which she polled. Miss Smith is also a good politician—that was evidenced by the strategy which she used in the closing hours of the contest. Every young lady is glad to be popular and in these days of suffragettes most young ladies, no doubt, are delighted to be hailed as good politicians. So, having paid my dutiful respects to the Queen Elect by yielding her the palm for popularity and political sagacity, I do not feel called upon to rhapsodize on her queenly airs. Tall and of graceful figure is Queen Grace with graces of mind and heart more than enough to compensate for anything that she may lack in facial fascination. I happened in at the St. Francis Hotel last Saturday night when the final votes in the contest were being cast and counted. The affair had all the impressiveness of an important function. The tapestry room was thronged with men and women. The contestants for queenly honors flitted hither and thither in excited conference with their multitudinous lady-managers. A band of our most enthusiastic Native Sons presided within an enclosed space over blackboards and adding machines. The orchestra discoursed music and the lady-managers discoursed votes to all the men who looked like ready money. Even some of the prospective queens did not disdain to smile votes out of susceptible masculinity. And as they looked very attractive in their low-cut gowns and their trailing draperies they were usually quite successful. But there was a spirit of hostility in the air and on investigation I found that Miss Grace Smith of the Owl Drug Company and Miss Lillian Jordan of the Hotel Manx were engaged in anything but friendly rivalry. Charges of unfairness were hurled about and the lady-managers of Miss Smith darted defiance at the lady-managers of Miss Jordan who darted it back again. It was exciting and to an outsider devoid of favoritism quite exhilarating. As the lady-managers did not hesitate to pour their grievances into the ears of the casual observer I learned something of the trouble.

Feminine Strategists

It seems that Miss Smith and Miss Jordan were thousands of votes ahead of all the other contestants and that both were holding back till the last moment in order to conceal their strength. Finally Miss Jordan's managers poured a stream of votes into the fight and still Miss Smith delayed to follow suit. Almost at the last minute her managers came forward with so many thousands of votes that Miss Jordan was swamped. Then a peculiar thing happened. Miss Jordan's managers announced that they had oodles of gold to buy more votes with but that they would not avail themselves of the opportunity to offset Miss Smith's advantage but would content themselves with protesting that they had been treated unfairly and would throw up the fight. To the outsider it looked as though they had been clearly outmaneuvered in the strategic battle, that they had "fallen down" at the critical moment. It looked as though Miss Jordan might well pray: "Deliver me from my lady-managers." At any rate the hour of midnight chimed with Miss Smith far in the lead and Miss Jordan's supporters still jingling coin of the realm and expatiating on their wrongs. The contest closed in considerable bitterness and it was not surprising to read the announcement afterwards that Miss Jordan would not act as maid of honor to the queen. Far be it from me to interfere in this feminine contest. Still it does seem that a voting contest is nothing more than a voting contest and that there is no room for complaint when one contestant takes every strategic advantage within the laws of the competition. I suppose the controversy will be waged in Parlor meetings for many a long day. There is always an aftermath of trouble in lady-politics.

ine guests to a seat without offering an apology. Scribbling a few lines on a visiting card Jouillir sent them to the offender and a flush of embarrassment overspread the features of the merchant when he read: "When one overturns a glass it is courteous to replenish it—Amedee Jouillir." The merchant rushed over to the artist whose identity he thus discovered and made profuse apology and an offer of restitution. But Jouillir pulled a serious face, waved a hand dramatically and answered: "It is now too late." The discomfited merchant retired to his fair companions where he fretted and fumed. Commerce wanted to be on good terms with Art but did not know how to accomplish the thing. Finally he sent a box of cigars to the table and although Jouillir was disposed to continue the punishment Harold Pracht acted as peacemaker and friendly relations were established. As the little drama was watched by many people who knew all three parties that merchant has probably decided that it will be well henceforth to apologize for such an accident, no matter who the party may be.

The Anomalous Henley

There is nothing for which we should be more grateful to nature than for disabling us from seeing ourselves as others see us. What a sad world this would be if each of us could hold a mirror up to the impressions that are made by his manner and conduct, one that reflected all the facets of his personality! Fancy, for example, what might happen if for a moment the Hon. Barclay Henley were to see himself as I see him. The mere thought of such a thing is appalling. Now not through anything like vulgar curiosity; have I been watching this eminent citizen. The truth is he has been thrusting himself upon me obstructing my line of vision as it were, and I have been unable to overlook him. I see him now challenging the professional ethics of our federal district attorney and prosecuting a public inquest into the abuses of justice in the federal courts. I find him as a hired attorney in veighing against practices, which, as an embryonic candidate for office, attitudinizing in the lime light, he approved with a warmth that betokened the heartiest sincerity. For incredible as it may appear the Barclay Henley who is now trying to prove that Dr. Perrin was the victim of the cruel machinations of Gumshoe Burns and Bob Devlin is the same Barclay Henley who but a short time ago was vociferating for the League of Justice and doing all in his power to persuade the public that the unscrupulous detective was incapable of wrongdoing. Nay at the very time that Mr. Henley was sponsoring Burns for the graft prosecution he was conscious of all the things that he is now censuring bitterly before a committee of Congress. Thus we see there are certain psychological phenomena that cause Mr. Henley to be more or less attractive to students of human nature. As we shall see from further study there is something of that duality of nature about Mr. Henley that Robert Louis Stevenson exploited in an immortal work of fiction.

The Things That Henley Abhors

Let us see what Mr. Henley objects to in the methods by which the conviction of his wealthy client was compassed. First he objects to the employment of detectives to watch a jury, his theory being that when jurors are under the surveillance of detectives employed by the State there is danger of their receiving impressions that the State has no right to make; also, that through fear of incurring suspicion of dishonesty the jurors might disregard the evidence and vote for conviction. I have no doubt that this is a correct view of the matter. Also I agree with Mr. Henley that justice is in danger of being perverted when detectives are sent out to familiarize themselves with the sentiments of prospective jurors in advance of their examination in court. But the question that puzzles me is, Why was Mr. Henley who entertains these views so ardent a partisan of the graft prosecution? He is well aware of the things that were done by Detective Burns in the graft cases. He must know, having kept in touch with disclosures made in court, that jurors were actually interviewed by detectives; that the prosecution tried to have men accepted as jurors who had confessed to detectives that they were prejudiced against defendants; that efforts were made to intimidate all members of the jury panel by having a serviceable grand jury threaten to indict men who had voted for acquittal. All these things Mr. Henley knew without manifesting the slightest feeling of revulsion. On the contrary he constituted himself an accomplice of the men that were outraging justice; for with the wild-eyed knitters he was exhorting the mob to tap the springs of clamor for the good of the cause.

Always With the People

Mr. Henley appears to have experienced a reversal of sentiment all along the line with respect to the ethics of criminal prosecutions. He has attempted to show that the public prosecutor was prejudiced against his client and resolved to procure his conviction. This Mr. Henley now regards as a most outrageous state of affairs. Yet it was precisely this state of affairs that he was aiding and abetting in the months not long since. He saw a prosecuting attorney going about unloading denunciation on the heads of men accused of crime and promising to get 'em. And he was blistering his hands with applause. He complains now that somebody told the grand jury that President Roosevelt was desirous of Dr. Perrin's indictment. He knew what was worse: that a Federal official, a representative of the office of Attorney-General of the United States, who was at the same time the employe of a private individual, in the hope of reaching that pet aversion of Theodore Roosevelt's, the late E. H. Harriman, participated in the deliberations of a grand jury (not a federal, but a state body) and urged the indictment of subordinates of the railroad magnate in despite the absence of the slightest proof of guilt. This is an infamy without parallel in the history of the United States. But it has yet to excite the indignation of the Hon. Barclay Henley. Seemingly he has not appreciated the significance of the enormity, or the nature of the precedent that was established when the President of the United States opened the doors of a grand jury room of one of the States to his personal representative in the hope of revenging himself on an enemy. But there are things of much less significance that Mr. Henley is able to apprehend. For instance he realizes the advantage that the prosecution has when it makes the chief witness an employe of the State. He has pointed out that a witness thus favored might be inclined to color his testimony. But this too is an inspiration of recent birth in Mr. Henley's mind. Witnesses for the graft prosecution were employed by the State without ever a murmur of disapproval from Barclay. Indeed everything that this gentleman is now complaining of has been done before with his approval. But when he was giving his approval he had no incentive to a different state of mind. Now he is on the side of his client. In the months agone he was ostensibly on the side of the dear people whose gratitude he is now putting to the test by giving them an opportunity to vote him into a job. History is repeating itself. Years ago Barclay was with the people as foreman of the notorious Wallace grand jury, and a little later he became a candidate for district attorney.

The Timely Mr. Beale

One of the first telegrams of congratulation received by the Hon. Hiram Johnson was from the Hon. Truxtun Beale, ex-Minister to Persia, now a California farmer and distinguished member of the Fremont Older school of reform. Mr. Beale's telegram was a hearty expression of enthusiasm and esteem. He regards the nomination of Mr. Johnson as one of the finest things that ever happened, a blow to corrupt politics and a boost for the languishing ideals. I regret very much that I have not at hand the remarks made by Mr. Johnson with reference to Mr. Beale when the latter was being prosecuted in one of our criminal courts for his assault on Fred Marriott. On that occasion the gubernatorial candidate was the attorney for the prosecution, and his views and those of Mr. Beale regarding the social and other amenities were absolutely irreconcilable. If when Mr. Johnson was vociferating for a fee in the Marriott case anybody had ventured to whisper into the ear of the man from Persia the prediction that he would some day hail the ranting attorney as a public benefactor and a man of unsullied character the probability is that Mr. Beale would have flared up as does the perturbed turkey cock at a piece of red flannel. How strange are the bedfellows made by politics!

His Honorable Ambition

Among the golden moments in the stream of politics are those in which the successful candidate receives the felicitations of his fellow patriots. It is in these moments that the job-chaser, who is always alert in laying hold of favorable junctures, takes hold of opportunity by the forelock. So it has come to be proverbial among men versed in the mysteries of politics that congratulations received by candidates are bids for political perferment. And thus has it come to pass that Mr. Truxtun Beale is suspected of having overcome prejudice with the honorable ambition to become a regent of the State University along with Mr. Fremont Older, who expects to be the power behind the throne in the event of Mr. Johnson's election—the Abe Ruef, as it were, of the Administration. Mr. Older has been eager for many years to become a regent. He petitioned for the honor when Henry T. Gage was Governor, and Gage lost his friendship by his inability to muster up the courage to make the appointment.

Why There is Joy in Heaven

Among the early birds that rushed congratulations to Mr. Johnson was "Dick" Chute of Tuolumne. Doubtless there are some of my readers who are not acquainted with Mr. Chute as many years have passed since he figured among San Francisco's most prominent citizens. "Dick" Chute was one of the political bosses of other days. With "Jim" Gannon he manipulated the railroad machine when it was making unsavory history with the aid of Senator Stanford's money. It was "Dick" Chute that tested the validity of the doings of the Wallace grand jury. At the present time the ineffable Richard is running a newspaper in Sonora, and he is one of Mr. Johnson's most ardent supporters. As a reformer he is full brother of the star-eyed goddess. His shibboleth is "Down with the railroad machine!" He is as much elated over the prospect of putting an end to corrupt machine politics as either Charley Curry, "Tim" Sullivan or any of the other nearly burnt out brands that have been snatched from the burning.

"Rooseveltizing" the Army

A number of references have been made in these columns to the unsatisfactory condition of the army in the Philippines as instanced by the succession of courts martial at Fort McKinley and elsewhere. San Franciscans have a special interest in these courts martial because several of those who have been under charges are well-known here. One court martial, it will be remembered, grew out of the suicide of Lieutenant Janney, the husband of the former Madeline McKissick of this city, while another, indirectly connected with it, was the court martial of Chaplain Dallam who was stationed in this city before going to the islands. In explanation of the unhappy military conditions in the Philippines an army officer has written to the New York Evening Post stating that insubordination and lack of regard for rank are at the bottom of the trouble and these evils he thinks spring from the "rooseveltizing" of the army.

A Complication of Diseases

This army officer says that the service, not only in the islands but also in the United States, is suffering from a complication of diseases, chief of which is insubordination. He says that the spirit of insubordination is rampant at Fort McKinley in Luzon, just as it is rampant elsewhere, and to this spirit he traces the numerous courts martial. "The lack of deference for rank now so universal in the army" is what he blames for this state of affairs and he insists that this lack will continue as long as the "highest military authorities give it their irresistible countenance and support," which is certainly logical if one admits the premise on which it is based. He then calls attention to a poem which was addressed to Colonel Roosevelt while he occupied the White House and endorses the following lines as being substantially correct:

Rank, grade, degree, priority of place,
In law and custom old the stable base
Of discipline, good order, wholesome sway,
By cruel blows have fallen in decay;
Command grows faint, authority complains
That the one below the one above disdains;
Degree, the ladder of all high designs,
Too much neglected totters and declines;
The rights of rank, disputed face to face,
No longer firmly hold established place.
And from all sides deep, earnest prayers arise
That you the army cease to rooseveltize,
And in good time the feverish, envious rage
Of sheer self-seeking rivalry assuage.

His letter concludes with the following words: "It has come to pass that even second lieutenants of less than a year's commissioned service do things that clearly indicate they hold themselves in wisdom much above their seniors, especially when the latter chance to have gray hair or field rank. It is needless to say that this self-exaltation is intensified by the single and again by the double bar, which of late years have come to many almost beardless youths. Rank is indispensable to armies, and to its vigorous life and well being respect is essential, not only from those below, but especially from those above."

Chaplain Dallam's Statement

Chaplain Dallam of the Twelfth Infantry, it will be recalled, criticized his superiors for not doing more to prevent the suicide of Lieutenant Janney. He was to have been court martialed for this, but there being some doubt as to his mental condition he was ordered to the division hospital in Manila for observation. While there he wrote a review of his case which contains some remarkable statements. The chaplain says among other things that the post commander of Fort McKinley told him that he did not wish him to preach anything contrary to the doctrine of the Episcopal Church, but refused to give him this order in writing. Chaplain Dallam goes on to say: "My indignation has steadily deepened as I have realized that all the correspondence connected with my case has gone from one high authority to another without any action being taken to right my position, or to bring to punishment a general officer who could deliberately lend himself to religious intolerance, and support the position he took by statements not merely unsupported by any fact whatever, but with evidence to the contrary in his possession. . . . Had it been a junior officer who had made the statements General Carter made, he would long ago have been court martialed. I know not by what process of logic it is assumed that the higher a man's rank the freer he is from moral obligation. That all this experience of mine has subjected me to nervous strain, I have long been aware; that it has affected my mind is for others to decide. The day I was brought to the hospital had been a peculiarly trying one. I had first been subjected to un mauvais quart d'heure with Colonel Bowen, whose voice under excitement has always had the effect of rasping my nerves. I may say in closing that I have been, until my experience here, uniformly happy in the army. The soldiers have inspired me with a sincere affection, and the officers of my own regiment have been, in most cases, true friends."

What Will Come of All This?

It is quite apparent that conditions in Manila cannot continue as at present without effecting a complete demoralization of military discipline. When the officers of a post are engaged in continual bickering of the unseemly kind to which the parties to this dispute have lent themselves it is inevitable that the trouble should spread to the ranks and then the ordinary subordination of a regiment or a post goes by the board. The Secretary of War has been investigating conditions in the army of the Philippines for himself and it is the opinion of military observers that there will be some radical changes as the result of his inquiries. It is a strange circumstance that a San Francisco girl whose life has been replete with sensational incidents should be so

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll notice the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

This perfection is obtained only by owning your own plantation in Turkey—the careful watchfulness from the seeding to the finished article.

The Venomous Mr. Browne

The obliquity of moral vision prevalent among moralists is perhaps the saddest of all the sad and disheartening phenomena of the day. What sort of spiritual improvement can we hope for with the self-imposed task of producing it in the hands of men who are obviously incapacitated from differentiating right and wrong? So frequent have been the illustrations of this incapacity, it has occurred to me that it would be as absurd to put these purblind reformers at the helm of affairs as for the trees of the forest to ask the brambles and stink-weeds to reign over them. For a recent illustration consider the exoneration of Frank J. Browne by the self-righteous gentlemen of the Good Government League, the same self-righteous ones who sent out marked envelopes to trap voters all unconscious of the testable character of the performance. Frank J. Browne was their candidate for superintendent of schools. Instead of going before the people on his merits he conducted a campaign of vilification against his opponent, Mr. Alfred Roncovieri. Unsupplied with facts to give support to personal abuse he made use of mean innuendoes, making it obvious to any person of sound understanding that he was unfit for the office he so ardently coveted. Having invited retaliation his record in another city was brought to light, and the truth was told as to accusations that had been made against him. Thereupon the Good Government League made a superficial investigation of the charges and rendered a verdict to the effect that they were without foundation. Now of course it doesn't matter whether or not Mr. Browne was wrongfully accused of discreditable practices before coming to San Francisco. We know that he has been guilty of most discreditable conduct in San Francisco. It ought to have been sufficient for the Good Government League to know that Mr. Browne had traduced his opponent. But it never occurred to the moralists of the League that they were exposing themselves to public contempt by urging the people to put a commonplace mud-slinger in charge of the school department.

The Emporia Moralist

Another example of obliquity of moral vision comes from Emporia, Kansas, where William Allen White holds forth as the oracle of the insurgents. Mr. White is the Call's favorite authority on insurgency. The other day Mr. White lambasted President Taft for not keeping a patronage contract with that most impeccable of statesmen, the Hon. Albert J. Beveridge. According to White the President promised to give Senator Beveridge twenty odd postmasterships in Indiana, but came through with only seventeen. According to White the Senator is one of the grandest of men, but Taft is anathema. And yet Sir Oracle tells us that his hero obtained the President's promise by agreeing to vote for certain Administration measures. In other words Beveridge sold himself for a mess of federal patronage. Of course there is another side to the story—the President's side—but it can throw no light on Mr. William Allen White's code of morals.

Ripley's Stupendous Audacity

On August 1 President Ripley of the Santa Fe railroad addressed a letter to the employees of that corporation advising them as to the attitude of the company in politics. He explained that it was written because he had received letters from employees asking for information as to the wishes of the management in political matters. The letter was written in Chicago, and copies were sent to employees in all the States through which the Santa Fe is operated. In this letter President Ripley says that "the company has consistently refused to be mixed up in political questions or to attempt in any manner to influence the votes of its employees," and that it has no intention of deviating from this policy. He continues: "Yet in these days when the demagogue is in evidence and unjust attacks are being made upon the railroads I may properly suggest that you consider what effect your vote will have upon the future. You all know, I think, that the effort of the management has been to treat its men fairly, as well as to serve the public faithfully and well. All of you, I hope, have pride in the Santa Fe and what it has accomplished. We do not need to be ashamed of what we have done, and we deny that we need punishment. Yet certain candidates are asking for election on the ground that further regulation is necessary—and further reduction of rates. You know—we can ascertain—the history and record of the various candidates. You know who is anti-railroad and who is conservative. The Santa Fe has no candidate for any office. It has no interest in the success or defeat of any political party, but I do not hesitate to say that its interests and yours will be conserved if its employees cast their votes solidly against those who stand for anti-railroad legislation and who seek to build themselves up on that platform."

A Widespread Notion

This letter is quoted in full in the San Francisco correspondence of the Stockton Mail for the purpose of showing that "the Santa Fe does things less rawly" than its competitors, and the correspondent by his comments makes it clear that he regards the letter as a specimen of rather discreditable disingenuousness. Doubtless this view of the matter will be shared by many others, among whom will perhaps be found some of the emotional gentlemen who welcomed with cheers and tears the first train of the Western Pacific. Many intelligent persons who appreciate the enterprise and energy of railroad builders, who are not unconscious of our indebtedness to the men who have supplied us with transportation facilities, will be shocked to learn that President Ripley has had the audacity to mention the subject of politics to the employees of the Santa Fe. For the notion seems to be widespread that there is an unwritten law in this country which makes it the crime of crimes for anybody connected with a railroad to take any part in politics. Organized labor can advocate and procure class legislation without exciting comment. The liquor interests, the insurance interests—business interests generally—have their right to seek to protect themselves universally recognized, but the railroads without which almost all other kinds of business are impossible, are expected to be quiescent, to make no effort to prevent the election of their avowed enemies, and to submit to hold-ups later on. This being the prevailing theory it is natural that men should be shocked at President Ripley's frank discussion of politics in a letter to his employees. In campaign times the only decent thing for a railroad president to do is to get into a cyclone cellar and hold his tongue.

No Snub for the Countess of Granard

The Countess of Granard is coming to this city and the leaders of the Burlingame set are making arrangements to entertain her. This is interesting and throws me into a reminiscent mood. The Countess of Granard, as everybody knows, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ogden Mills and the granddaughter of the late D. O. Mills. Mrs. Ogden Mills was a Miss Livingstone and cherishes a deep conviction that the blue blood which flows in her veins is of a very superior quality. The Livingstones have one of those very rare and awe-inspiring things, a Pedigree. Mrs. Mills is exceedingly proud of that pedigree and lives up to it. She not only knows it by heart but can calculate to a nicety just what degree of exclusiveness is imposed upon her by its various ramifications. On a certain memorable occasion Mrs. Mills nee Livingstone made the statement—or at least is credited with having made the statement—that she would not sit down to the table with a San Francisco woman because there are no ladies in San Francisco. The remark of course was meant in a genealogical sense. Mrs. Mills was thinking of her pedigree when she made it; the ultra-blue blood of the Livingstones was coursing spiritedly through her veins at the time. Of course we all know that pedigrees are none too common in San Francisco. Most of our family trees are twigs. Just the same the remark was exceedingly resented here. It cut deeply and has not been forgotten. But San Francisco society is charitable and does not assume the biblical prerogative of visiting the sins of the mother on the daughter. So when the Countess of Granard comes to San Francisco she will be received with the nearest approach to an open-arm welcome that strict social usage will permit. Miss Jennie Crocker is a relative of hers and for the sake of the Crockers, if for no other reason, the snub of Mrs. Mills will be ignored.

The Pope and Fashionable Dress

At one of the smart social gatherings this week a lady well known in the exclusive corral of society filled in a gap in the conversation by remarking that Pope Pius had denounced the prevailing fashions in woman's dress. There was quite a flutter of interest over this until a very beautiful matron who is known to be a devout communicant of the Catholic church declared that she did not think the despatch carrying the statement could be true. "It is exceedingly rare," she said, "for the Pope to interfere in such ephemeral matters. The Pope through his chamberlain regulates the dress of all, both men and women, who seek audience but otherwise I have never heard of either the present pontiff or Pope Leo trying to influence fashions. The Vatican is too busy with the cure of souls to care much about feminine clothes. As a matter of fact the church is exceedingly reasonable about such matters. Those who know about a recent order in regard to the wearing of scapulars—something of course which concerns Catholics only—realize this. The order was made solely for the accommodation of ladies. But even if it is true that the Pope has condemned certain fashions it does not follow that Catholic women will discard them. They will receive his admonitions with respect and continue to dress according to the dictates of their own taste. Nobody will ever dream of accusing them of not being orthodox on that account." All of which seems to me eminently sensible.

Annette Kellerman's Rival

We have been regaled during the past month with several stories of the natatorial prowess of the fair maids who have been contributing to the excitement of the summer colony at Santa Barbara. In the columns of the newspapers these mermaids of the Potter have been credited with feats which seem to make them fit candidates for a race across the English Channel, but I take leave to state that there is a little girl in San Francisco who can outswim them all. I say this on very respectable authority, the authority of Miss Annette Kellerman. The girl in question is Miss Dorothy Eaton, the fourteen-year old daughter of Louis Eaton, the well-known organist of Trinity Church. Miss Eaton and Miss Kellerman gave an exhibition at Sutro's Baths a few mornings ago to a select gathering which included Dr. Clappett, the rector of Trinity. It was worth the price of admission and a great deal more. The mature professional swimmer and the girlish amateur indulged in feats of diving, long-distance swimming and water-wrestling which excited the admiration of all who had the good fortune to be present. At the conclusion of the exhibition Miss Kellerman told her friends that she had never seen a girl of Miss Eaton's tender years who was such a mistress of the water and she predicted that her young antagonist would grow up to be a world's champion. Miss Eaton is as pretty as she is graceful and as becomes the daughter of one of our best musicians is as accomplished in other respects as she is in swimming.

"Shopping" is Postponed

The musical comedy skit, "Shopping," with libretto by Willard Barton and music by Herman Heller will not be given at Menlo on September 17 as was announced some time ago. Its first production has been postponed, principally on account of the absence in Europe of Miss Kathleen De Young who is cast for one of the principal roles. When a later date has been fixed it is probable that society will have the opportunity of seeing the skit in this city instead of down the peninsula as the producers are thinking seriously of putting it on at the St. Francis Hotel. In addition to the absence of Miss De Young there is still another reason for postponing "Shopping." A skit of this sort depends for its success on careful rehearsals and the rehearsals so far have not been very satisfactory. Attempts have been made to hold rehearsals three times a week but the attempts have not succeeded. The participants, being members of the social herd with multifarious engagements in this giddy season, have found themselves at Santa Barbara or Del Monte or Tahoe or elsewhere when they should be perfecting themselves in their parts, so the preparations have lagged. It is just as well, therefore, that the first production should be delayed until the summer gayeties have somewhat subsided.

The Plot of "Shopping"

The plot of this Barton-Heller musical skit has been more or less of a secret, but I have received some inkling of it and give what I have heard for just exactly what it may be worth. It is a forty-five minute skit with four principal characters. There is a more or less refined shop girl, Annie Gray, to be played by Miss De Young; a tough shop girl, Rosie Blum, to be played by Miss Enid Gregg; an Englishman, to be enacted by Willard Barton and a tenor role which will be entrusted to Harry Pendleton. The Englishman enters a shop in quest of a certain shade of yellow gloves and becomes enamored of the tough girl. As he cannot find the particular shade of glove which he wishes he has a good excuse to pay the shop repeated visits and on one of them he flirts with the other shop girl and is so indiscreet as to let the tough girl discover him kissing her rival. That furnishes the complications which are fast and furiously amusing. As Miss De Young and Miss Gregg have the temperament which makes success on the amateur stage more or less certain society is looking forward with considerable curiosity to their portrayals. Willard Barton's book is said to be very clever and Heller's music is enthusiastically approved by those who have heard it.

He Taught Rigo "Cavalleria"

Speaking of Heller reminds me of a story which I had from his lips some time ago. Heller used to be at the Valencia Theater but now leads the orchestra at the St. Francis and his concerts in the tapestry room are very much enjoyed by the ladies and gentlemen who drop in there for a quiet cocktail or highball. But that is not my story. When Heller was a youngster in Copenhagen Nils Gade, the well know musician, gave him his first violin and his first lessons. But Heller did not intend to follow music as a life study and when still very young he was located in a little town of Croatia studying electrical and mechanical engineering. The town depended for its music on the regimental band but one summer the regimental band had gone to the maneuvers and the inhabitants would have been without music had not a gypsy band appeared. The gypsy band played entirely by ear and their repertoire was not extensive. The townsfolk wanted them to play "Cavalleria Rusticana" which was then in the first flush of its vogue, but the gypsies had never heard it and the score meant nothing to them. At this juncture young Heller stepped in and played Cavalleria for the gypsies on his violin. When he had gone through the opera a couple of times the quick ears of the gypsies had mastered it completely and they rendered it to the general approval. One of the members of the band was Rigo. I wonder if he has ever thanked Heller for introducing him to the music of Mascagni?

She Killed a Rattler

Word comes to me from St. Helena that Mrs. Elmer Graves White who has been spending the summer there with her parents, Mrs. and Mrs.

R. N. Graves and her two sons, is regarded as the heroine of the countryside. Mrs. White was sitting on the porch of the Graves country home one afternoon with a number of friends when a rattlesnake appeared not ten feet away. Lifting their skirts and shrieking the rest of the party fled within the house, but not so Mrs. White. She seized a long stick and with a well-aimed blow brained the rattler. It had six rattles and one button. Mrs. White recently returned from a lengthy tour abroad. During her travels she spent most of her time in study. Early in September she will return to San Francisco to open a musical studio. Those who have heard her sing recently tell me that she possesses a voice of rare quality and great cultivation. Mrs. White is a cousin of the Mayo Newhalls and Miss Linda Cadwalader and her studio this winter will be the rendezvous of the smart set.

The Hobble is American

Apropos an accident which happened recently to a fashionable Parisienne the hobble skirt has come in for a lot of denunciation in the capital of the world. This denunciation becomes interesting to us because America is not only credited with the invention of the amazing garment but also blamed for its introduction into Paris. This is probably the first time that the old order of derivation has been reversed in regard to so important an article of feminine attire. The accident in question occurred when a young woman attired in a hobble skirt was alighting from a taxicab. She fell and broke her leg, receiving besides distressing bruises on the head and face. The accident has received a great deal of exploitation in Paris where the study of the immaterial is one of the most popular pursuits. A leading man dressmaker of Paris who has been interviewed on the hobble skirt as a dangerous evil declares that it was brought to Paris by certain fair Americans and that reputable makers of Paris modes have always opposed it. "It is only worn," he says, "by women who desire to make themselves remarked in public. It has never been acclimated in the upper social circles." Another "grand couturier" says: "The hobble skirt is now seen only in ready made fashions and never was adopted by the really elegant. This grotesque mode will soon disappear as in winter it becomes absurdly impossible for a woman to manage a gown built in that manner."

How Long Will it Last?

It remains to be seen whether American fashions are sufficiently independent of the modes of Paris to warrant the retention of the hobble in the face of this condemnation. Will the American woman wear this peculiar garment in the United States when she learns that it is frowned upon in the fashionable center of Europe? I have my doubts on the subject. Our fashions in feminine gear have never been independent of Paris and I doubt whether a revolution in this regard will begin with such a confection as the hobble skirt. The directoire gown in its less radical forms received more or less approval from Paris where, as the name indicates, it originated. But the hobble is infinitely more freakish and grotesque than the directoire and it has been emphatically repudiated by the leading couturiers of the French capital. I think that fact spells its speedy relegation to obscurity. So far there have been comparatively few hobbles in San Francisco and those who have worn them have not been above the suspicion of catering to a craving for the notice of the general. Certainly they have received this notice wherever they have hobbled. Every neck is craned when a hobble appears in sight and from my own observation I can testify that the casual remarks of the spectators are usually far from complimentary to the wearers of these extraordinary habiliments. It is my opinion, offered with due modesty, as becomes one who does not pretend to be a cognoscente of the complexities of feminine apparel, that the hobble will very quickly be discredited. That accident in Paris will just about accomplish the result longed for by the Parisian modistes.

The De Sabla Pool

The swimming pool which is one of the attractions of the De Sabla country home is becoming famous. When Miss Vera De Sabla had her memorable coming-out party Miss Wilson and her partner who were dancing the barn dance fell into it in full evening array and emerged to make a half dozen paragraphs for the bavardes of the press. And now Miss Frances Howard has jumped into it, accoutered in complete and stunning costume. Who will be next? If this sort of thing continues the swimming pool will need a chronicler of its own. Miss Howard by the way is one of the most charming and interesting bachelor maids of our smartest set. She recently built a very pretty bungalow in San Mateo near the home of her brother Teddy and his wife and she lives there all alone. She is a tall girl with semi-blond coloring and is noted for her athletic prowess. The Howard family is the oldest in San Mateo.

The Ethics of House Culture

We all know that our beloved American millions are growing by leaps and bounds from their infant vision of education, crafts, and arts of all descriptions to the expression of a grounded and mature standard, to the apprehension of ethical values in our doings and havings, which values have given solidity and permanence to all that has been handed down to us from the past as good. There is always a reason why a thought or a thing has survived the destruction of Time's hammers, constantly grinding to dust all that is ephemeral and vain. That which is good lives on because of an immortal principle sustaining it, while that which is dust, or no-thing, returns to its native oblivion.

To be famous, to survive the general annihilation, one's achievements or thoughts must present to the world something which adds to our common knowledge of the principles underlying harmony and happiness. We are coming to learn, as our ancestors before us, that there is a Science of harmony which has fixed rules like all other sciences, and art in any direction is the constant endeavor to make plain to the student or observer the fundamental laws of that which is good.

The evolution of house culture in our midst has progressed but slowly, because we as a nation have not had time to study the primer of the past to learn its A B C. In other words, we have evolved a house as a protection, and a house in which to live to ourselves, but America as a whole has yet to learn the art of evolving a home, manifesting beauty as a result of its harmonious comfort.

As an apostle of the intrinsically good and true in interior decorations, Miss Elsie de Wolfe of New York and Paris has earned an enviable place. Critics of note acclaim that she "will go down in history" as the one person today who has done most to arouse our public to the true culture of European house decoration. She has led her followers away from the heavy and ornate and spectacular to the simple and elegant French paneling, from clumsy heavy furniture to the beautiful luxurious lines of the old models, and to the charming mingling of various soft colors in the room in place of the one flat tone so monotonous to the eye.

Miss de Wolfe has also been dubbed the "chintz decorator," not only because she was the first to introduce these extensively to the American homes, but she has shown to what a great extent they may be used. Do not confound "chintzes" with the ordinary cretonnes—it is like comparing an oil painting with a chromo. The fabrics honored by this clever artist are wonderful old designs portrayed in exquisite colors on linen.

Miss de Wolfe has dared more in color effects than any other house artist we have, and all over and Country Club, decorated by Miss de Wolfe, "Doesn't this room seem to you as if it had always been just this way?" This remark sets forth in a nut-shell the ethical value of this remarkable young woman's work—she furnishes a house so it looks like home, and you feel on entering that it has been that way for years and years, this country she has evolved most fascinating and unusual rooms, but they are always liveable because they develop from carefully considered cause and effect, and she never produces a "freak" room, perhaps startling and bizarre, but in which one could not feel at home. I overheard a lady remark while viewing the library of the Town and once having entered you feel like staying there for years and years.

The accompanying photographs are from the recently completed residence of Senator G. S. Nixon in Washington, D. C. This entire house was planned and carried out by the sister-in-law of Miss de Wolfe, Mrs. Edgar de Wolfe of San Francisco, to whom is entrusted all her Western work. The beauty of this house is considered to be its exquisite color scheme. The ivory or grey walls and woodwork form a splendid background for the beautiful fabrics used, such as the 18th Century damasks and old English chintzes.

The interior is quite Georgian in architecture, and this dining room exemplifies the simple elegance of an old English country house. Its walls are canvased and painted in soft green, and the ceiling and woodwork in ivory white. The heavy rug is in dark green, and the curtains in broad green and white stripe silk. The lovely furniture is a hand-painted Adams set, having an ivory ground with green design. Over the mantel of green and white marble hangs a wonderful old Italian painting, the one picture used in the room. Especially designed appliques and center light in beautifully carved wood and enameled in dull green and gold give the complete finish to this room, so restful to the eyes in its simplicity.

Mrs. Nixon's bed room, shown herewith, is another charming effect in color. Here the walls are also paneled in the straight lines, and painted in old ivory. The beautiful Marquetric floor is covered by a grey Elsie de Wolfe carpet made in rug. The curtains and silk dressing table are of Gobelin blue Stire, ornamented with tiny silk roses. The old hand carved white and gold French bed is upholstered in the same rich blue. Covering the very comfortable chaise longue and large arm chair is the fascinating Rocaille chintz, which combines in its flower design soft blue and rich rose with a cream ground. This chintz, with its soft blending of tones, serves as a perfect medium to tie the ivory walls, grey carpet and rich blue curtains and bed together in one harmonious ensemble.

The mantel is crowned by a superb Nattier portrait, and in keeping with this are two very old prints and a lovely Madonna from Italy. In the corner stands an antique French marquetry commode with blue Chinese porcelain lamp and soft rose shade. No black and white could possibly convey the soft richness of color in this room, which is delightfully feminine.

Throughout the house are many fine old pieces. In the living room one admires the beautiful Queen Anne mirrors and the Chippendale table and chairs. The hall contains a very fine Console table and Italian mirror—also a black lacquer chest, considered one of the best pieces ever brought to this country.

There is much comment in our midst about the H. E. Bothin residence in Ross Valley as being one of the most attractive country houses in the State. This is a very good example of Miss de Wolfe's method. The simplicity with which the colors are thrown together in this delightful house could only emanate from an artist. One receives on traversing the upper floor an impression of almost kaleidoscopic loveliness, as all the soft colors of the rainbow are reflected from the dainty bed rooms opening on the hall. There follows in lovely succession a room in mauve and blue, one in soft grey, rose and blue, an other in delicate yellow with a hand painted old English set, one in pink and tan chintz, and last but not least, the Genie de la Paix room.

This unique and charming room has excited perhaps more artistic commendation than anything done by this firm in the West. As some one remarked, "Only a person who dares in colors like Miss de Wolfe could evolve such a room." The basic tone of the room is green, but the combination of several colors with this is so unusual that it would be impossible to describe it with justice. One feels as if he had entered an old French chateau, this bed room reflects so quaintly the French atmosphere with its walls covered in the famous Genie de la Paix chintz, and its beautiful green draperies looped back with garlands of roses.

The soft ivory tones of the woodwork all over this house present an ideal background for the treatment of chintzes as they are used in England. Several lovely chairs of chintz are used in the living room. The dining room reflects a shade of royal purple with touches of green, and glimpses are gained from here of a charming garden room with a fascinating grape chintz. On the other side is an adorable little breakfast room in cream and blue. The curtains here are trimmed with quaint old ruffled frills, and the furniture is cream enamel with garlands of pale blue forget-me-nots and bows. Two old prints adorn this room, passepartouted in cream and blue.

The possibilities of chintz, says Miss de Wolfe, are almost unlimited, as the beautiful old patterns give such opportunities for breaking up too flat a color scheme with contrast.

In designing an upstairs living room for Mrs. W. E. Dargie of Oakland, Mrs. de Wolfe evidently had in mind the beautiful grey hair and sparkling Spanish eyes of the fair hostess herself. Nothing could form a more exquisite background for such beauty than the combining of soft grey, mauve and blue in this room. Its walls reflect the grey, and curtains and upholstered English furniture are in a mauve and blue chintz. The floor covering is grey, and in glancing about now and then one surprises a sparkle of soft rose. A splendid old refectory table here is a duplicate of the one so admired in the Town and Country Club.

Reviewing Miss Elsie de Wolfe's decorative achievements in San Francisco and our immediate vicinity, we feel that she has been true in every respect to her standard of work in the East—that of "good, and good alone." And as we of the West were never so ready as at the present moment to appreciate the thoroughly good in interior decoration, it is a matter of congratulation that Miss de Wolfe has extended her activities to our Pacific Coast. We shall observe her work with interest, and feel assured that she will add materially to that achievement of true culture in our midst for which we are all striving.

As to "The Lottery Man"

By Edward F. O'Day

"The fundamental defect of 'The Lottery Man,' said The Young Man in his best oracular manner, "is that marriage is always a lottery."

"You are always disappointing me," responded The Old Timer; "perhaps that is why I like you so well."

"I was saying—" began The Young Man.

"I heard it the first time," cut in The Old Timer, "and permit me to say that it is one of the most bromidic tags of present-day conversation."

"Don't you think that marriage is a lottery?" queried The Young Man in astonishment.

"Most certainly not," answered The Old Timer; "marriage is the surest of sure-thing games."

"I am interested but not convinced," The Young Man taunted.

"Let us take this play as the basis of our argument," said The Old Timer, testing his highball. "The very name—"

"Knocks your argument on the head," interrupted The Young Man.

"Proves my theory," corrected The Old Timer. "Have you ever read Price on 'The Technique of the Drama?'"

"No and I never expect to," said The Young Man.

"My boy," admonished The Old Timer, "wilful ignorance is the unpardonable sin. When you read Price—and you will some day—you will find that one of the essentials of comedy is the achievement of the unexpected."

"The surprise, eh?" said The Young Man, blowing rings of smoke.

"Exactly," said The Old Timer; "and where would be the surprise of 'The Lottery Man' if marriage were a lottery?"

"I don't follow your argument," The Young Man murmured.

"You are not trying to," complained The Old Timer. "The title of the play leads us to expect that there will be some sort of a game of chance and the beginning of the first act shows us that the hero of the play is to be the prize in the game. Now where would be the essential surprise of the comedy if the hero were actually won in the lottery?"

"Might we not be surprised to learn who held the winning number?" asked The Young Man.

"Nonsense," exclaimed The Old Timer; "were you surprised when you learned that Lizzie won the hero?"

"I certainly was," said The Young Man.

"I envy your disingenuousness," replied The

GRACE BARBOUR

The new member of the Alcazar Stock Company who opens Monday evening in "His House in Order."

Old Timer, "even if I do not entirely believe in it. It was inevitable from the start that Lizzie should hold the winning number. That was necessary in order to complicate the plot."

"You are getting away from your argument," said The Young Man with a yawn.

"I am establishing my argument," insisted The Old Timer. "If marriage were a lottery Lizzie would be just the sort of a woman who would win The Lottery Man."

The Young Man shuddered and swallowed his Scotch.

"But marriage is not a lottery," continued The Old Timer, "because 'The Lottery Man' married the girl he wanted to marry. There was no chance about it. He simply picked her out in the first act and got her consent in the third, as all young men can do if they wish, whether in comedy or real life."

"But let us suppose—" began The Young Man.

"Let us suppose nothing," said The Old Timer, "until I finish my argument. If the play ended differently it would lack the necessary element of surprise. If Helene and not Lizzie had won Jack in the lottery—by fair means or foul—where would your play be? It would all be told in the title. The whole plot of the play would go to pieces if The Lottery Man were won in the lottery. Unsophisticated playgoers like yourself expect some such ending and when it ends differently you are pleasantly surprised. You leave the theater in a glow of satisfaction."

"I was glad Jack won Helen," said The Young Man smiling.

"And yet you thought he was going to draw her, as the lucky man draws the long straw," snorted The Old Timer.

"He was a lucky man just the same," persisted The Young Man.

"And you're a very sentimental young man," exclaimed The Old Timer, "otherwise you would know that he was playing a sure thing all the time. Luck is not the word."

"What is luck?" queried The Young Man.

"Do you mean in marriage?" asked The Old Timer.

"Yes," responded The Young Man.

"It is the carefully calculated series of events which keep a man single," answered The Old Timer sliding into his great coat.

The Hackett Season

Mr. Hackett surprised us in Samson. For years we had thought of him as a great actor of romantic parts with lace in his sleeves, a sword by his side. The awkward, hulking longshoreman was a pleasing contrast to our expectations and offered an excellent opportunity for Mr. Hackett to manifest his ability in a new line. He proved himself capable of doing bigger things than he has done in the "once upon a time" plays. Strength and force predominate in his interpretation of Samson. Everyone admires strength but there is another attribute necessarily lacking in Samson—an attribute more powerful than strength, more compelling than force. Persuasion. The blunt conviction of persuasion. Mr. Hackett is at his best in parts that permit him to win sympathy by persuasion and so far his romantic dramas are the only plays that have given him the chance. In Beaucaire he induces sympathy by his niceness of intonation, his chivalric demeanor and his completeness of execution combined with evident good taste in his personal appearance. In "The Prisoner of Zenda" Mr. Hackett's triple impersonations appeal to the imagination and win the heart of the audience by the excitement of quick changes and thrilling love scenes. As Don Caesar he captures the people by his happy predominance of authority and his exuberance of animal spirits. Of the three parts Beaucaire, Rassendyll and Don Caesar, Beaucaire allows the greatest scope for the display of his abilities; permits the widest range for the exercise of his voice. Mr. Hackett's voice is to him as the violin to the music master. It is the instrument he plays upon to control the emotions of his audience. In Beaucaire he touches every tone in the scale of natural sentiment. "John Glayde's Honor" has been called a great play but endurance is the supreme test of greatness and "John Glayde's Honor" could not endure without James K. Hackett. The success of Alfred Sutro's play is entirely due to the skillful handling it has received. The play is like an O. Henry story. It sparkles with clever repartee and ends with a surprise; but bright lines and an unusual ending cannot make a play great. Mr. Hackett is a great actor, not so much because of his versatility as because of his fineness of interpretation. The leap from Samson to Beaucaire was admirable as well as the change from Don Caesar to John Glayde, but direct antithesis in dramatic art is not a keen proof of ability. The short stepping between the three romantic plays, Beaucaire, Zenda and Don Caesar is far more remarkable. If Beaucaire had been less gracious or Rassendyll less kingly, or Don Caesar less strident the three sabreurs would be lodged in our memory as similar as triplets. For three weeks in succession he played the same type in a different way without the slightest confusion of detail. It is this subtlety of delineation that makes Mr. Hackett a great actor. The accepted definition of genius is one endowed with unusual mental vigor who has cultivated the capacity for taking infinite pains. The word is applicable to Mr. Hackett. He is not an old-fashioned genius—with the "sacred flame." There is nothing illusive about him; he is real, a great big man, mentally and physically. The same kind of genius that has raised him to the pinnacle of his art would have served him as well in any other profession. Will power dominates his genius. The past seven weeks at the Alvaraz will live in theatrical history and Mr. Hackett will live in the hearts of San Francisco people.

—Mrs. A. L. Rogers.

The Alcazar Season Starts

With four new players in the cast the Alcazar's regular stock season will be opened next Monday with a Pinero play which has never been presented in San Francisco. "His House in Order" is the offering and it will be the medium of introducing to Alcazar patrons Miss Jane Gordon, leading woman; Mr. Thurston Hall, leading man; Grace Barbour, second leading woman and Mr. Thomas Chatterton, juvenile premier. All of these people are equipped with excellent credentials and rehearsals indicate that they will all make good with the Alcazar's exacting clientele. Mr. Howard Hickman will reappear after an eight weeks' absence and most of the other favorite members of last season's company will also be in evidence.

At the Columbia

"Seven Days" will enter upon its last week next Monday night at the Columbia. It is breaking records at the Columbia Theater. Its engagement will show a sum total of receipts unequaled by any other farcial production here. There will be matinees on Wednesday and Saturday. The last performance is announced for the night of Sunday, September 4. Rose Stahl has played the role of Patricia O'Brien in James Forbes' comedy "The Chorus Lady" for the past several seasons. Local playgoers will again have an opportunity to see Miss Stahl in this part at the Columbia beginning Monday, September 5.

Miss Jewel's Last Week at Ye Liberty

Next Monday evening Izzetta Jewel begins the last week of her season at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, with the Clyde Fitch comedy, "Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines." The role of Madame Trentoni was created by Ethel Barrymore and it gives Miss Jewel excellent opportunities. In the title role Sydney Ayres will be equally well provided for. The cast is a long one, so all the favorites of the company will appear to advantage and with the careful mounting it is sure to receive by Ye Liberty management "Captain Jinks" should be a most popular offering. It will be followed by "The Truth" in which Miss Muriel Hope, the new leading lady of the company, will make her initial Oakland appearance. "The Truth" will begin its run with a special matinee on Labor Day.

The Last of the Bevanis

With two performances tomorrow (Sunday) the Bevani Opera Company will enter into its final week at Idora Park, offering "The Love Tales of Hoffmann." Offenbach's beautiful opera was presented at Idora Park three years ago when it proved very popular. The role of Hoffmann will be alternately taken by the two tenors, Eugenio Battain and Umberto Sacchetti. Battain will sing at the Sunday matinee. The triple role of Hoffmann's loved ones will be sung by Regina Vicarino. Channing Ellery, the millionaire band owner, is now presenting his famous Royal Italian Band at Idora. It has already won hearty approval from the patrons of the park. It is the most expensive band yet acquired by the park management; and it lives up to its reputation for no band has excelled this organization in the rendition of artistic music. Ellery and his Royal Italians will be at Idora until the close of the park, which will be on October 2.

At the Savoy

The first of the "Independent" attractions secured by John Cort for the Savoy Theater has been thoroughly satisfactory in every particular. The second and last week of "The Lottery Man" will commence this Sunday evening. On Sunday evening, September 4, Wilton Lackaye, a San Francisco favorite, will begin an engagement limited to one week in Cleveland Moffett's sociological drama, "The Battle."

Novelities at the Orpheum

The Top o' th' World Dancers will present a very pretentious and original ensemble at the Orpheum next week. It was the feature of the musical comedy of the same name. It includes a "Collie Ballet" of thoroughbred Scotch shepherd dogs. George McKay and John Cantwell, dancing comedians, will appear in their satire, "On the Great White Way." Mr. and Mrs. Erwin Connelly will be seen in their condensation of Gilbert's "Sweethearts." The Kraggs Trio, European trapeze artists, will make their first appearance in this city. Next week will be the last of The Six Original Kaufmans, Al Jolson, Renee and Miss Dupree in "The Minister's Wife."

The Change in Humor

An old man, who was at the first performance of Tom Robertson's "Caste," went to see the play again when it was recently revived in New York. When he was asked how he enjoyed the performance he replied: "It was ghastly. The theater was full of the ghosts of dead laughs. The young people cried at the same things that made us cry, but they did not laugh in the same places where we old boys used to laugh."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The reactionary tendency in securities during the past week or so was the result of some profit taking by bankers who protected values at the end of July. It also seems reasonable to believe that a check was put on the market, as prices were advancing so fast as to endanger the Wall street position. There is very little that may not be construed as favorable to the future of trade and industry throughout the country. The latest reports from a wide area of crop country indicate a heavy yield of farm products this year and this is the foundation on which the entire Wall street fabric is based in the matter of values. The money question in the crop moving period is purely technical and this year, as a result of heavy liquidation in Wall street and by the farmer who has been forced to market his products, we expect to see the critical fall period pass over with but little stringency. There is already a sign of weakening in the steel industry as a result of the excellent crop outlook, hardening of prices being the first indication; and by the latter part of the year we look for material activity in all lines of manufacture. We look to see the stock market kept under perfect control by the banking interests until the requirements of the Western banks are known and the critical period of the money situation is over and at the same time we look for higher prices.

Wheat—Rapidly accumulating supplies with expensive carrying charges, as against an eager demand, cash wheat at a premium over futures and the absence of any notable supply at the usual centers of accumulation a year ago, mark the all-important difference between the wheat situation of today and that of a year ago. Theories as to the world's shortage will not count very much with speculators of the practical turn as long as it costs them about a cent and a half a bushel a month to own wheat. This is a percentage against which it is very hard to work. It is a condition that has not been seen for several years. In fact, in the two previous years, the advantage was all with the owner of the property and it was the short seller who had the percentage against him and was put to his utmost to hold his own. Speculators, whether from force of habit, natural temperament or well-founded belief that ultimate values may be higher than now, have bought wheat in the last week and have fought a losing game. All things considered, while the general situation points to lower prices, it is felt that the decline has temporarily gone far enough and the market should have a slight reaction upward, if on nothing else than short-covering.

Corn—Generous rains for the past week or so, which have covered every part of the corn belt, did an immense amount of good to the corn and also counted to some extent against prices. It is generally conceded now that the only important danger to the crop lies in the possibility of frost. The crop this year, however, is so irregular on account of re-planting and the early Spring vicissitudes and drawbacks that a larger proportion than usual will be exposed to frost damage. Barring accidents, however, there will probably be a further settling of prices.

Cotton—The United States Bureau of the Census will issue the first ginners' report, carrying cotton ginned prior to September 1, on or about September 8. This report will compare with 388,242 bales ginned during the same period last year and 402,229 in 1908. The futility of attempting to make the amount of cotton ginned prior to September 1 an indication of the total ginning for the season is readily shown by a comparison of the figures during previous years. For instance, the largest amount of cotton ginned prior to September 1 on record was 476,655 bales in 1905 and the total ginning that season was only 10,495,105 bales. In 1907 only 200,278 bales were ginned prior to September 1 and yet the total ginning for that season was 11,057,000 bales. On account of the high price this season and the premature opening of the cotton plants in Texas, as a result of the drought and high temperatures, many persons think that the ginnings prior to September 1 this year will establish a new high record. Receipts of cotton in the Southwest so far have been comparatively large but it does not seem that the receipts of new cotton, prior to September 1, are any better guide. Therefore the only value of such information is its probable effect on the present spot and statistical position. Since the first of the month the weather in all of the cotton States, except Texas, has been highly favorable for the growing crop and the recovery from the unpromising outlook of a month ago has been marked, but it remains to be seen whether or not this improvement has been great enough to overcome the natural deterioration which invariably takes place in August even when the crop is in good condition. For the past week or so south, southwest and central Texas have received a generous distribution of moisture which has put an end to the long dry spell in the southwest and while the rains may have come too late to prove of any great value, still they will not be without their influence on sentiment, unless followed closely by hot winds and high temperatures. The mainstay of the market for cotton futures at present seems to be the scarcity of cotton for delivery on August contracts. It remains to be seen whether the same character of support will be offered in the September settlements. In the meantime we look for a scalping market and believe it only conservative to take profits on all hard spots until the future course of the market can be more clearly defined.

Copper—Copper metal is stronger on a greatly improved demand. Lake is around 13 cents bid and electrolytic from 12 5-8 to 13 cents a pound. Consumers are in the market bidding for large lots of copper metal but it appears that the producers are pretty well sold out and that by far the greater proportion of the world's copper metal surplus is in speculators' hands. The report of the Copper Producers' Association, covering the month of July, made a much more favorable showing than had been generally expected. July's American production was 118,370,000 pounds as compared with 127,219,188 pounds in June, indicating that curtailment of output is already under way. These figures coupled with generally better news all around on the copper situation seem to imply that the turn for the better in copper stocks is more than temporary. While we do not look for any wild fluctuations during the next month, we would not be surprised to see a better trading market for copper stocks at a slight enhancement in prices.

Local Securities—The market for local investment stocks and bonds for some months past has been a very dull affair with small sized sales and but few important changes. Of the bond department little can be said outside of the fact that there has been a high degree of firmness shown all along the line. Among the stocks Spring Valley Water is having a steady uplift and it would not be surprising to hear shortly of a renewal of negotiations with the municipality for the purchase of the water company's plant. Associated Oil has been rather active but mostly at a decline. A general slump in the oil industry which is thought to be temporary, is the chief influence against Associated Oil, coupled with the usual rumors of banks calling loans and insiders selling out which always pop up when confirmable news is scarce. At the present writing this stock is showing a renewed demand and has already recovered several points from last week's low mark which seems to prove that the decline was brought about by the market receiving a large sized selling order at a time when the buying demand was limited. Alaska Packers stock, after being depressed on the poor showing of the Bristol Bay pack reports, seems to have touched bottom for the time being and is at present recovering some of its losses. One of the strongest spots in the local market is the action of the stocks of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. The company's statement for the six months ending June 30 which was issued the other day, shows a net balance after deducting all sorts of expenses and charges, of $943,117.31 and it is the general impression that after the trust agreement expires, which provides for no dividends on the common stock until after January, 1911, the company will put the common stock immediately on a dividend basis. Of course it remains to be seen just what percentage of dividends will be paid, though it is generally conceded that the common dividends will exceed four and that it will be within the power of the company to pay six per cent. Dividend discussion is causing an improving demand for Pacific Gas common stock at slightly higher prices and as the time approaches for a show-down it is felt that this stock will be the local market leader at prices a great deal higher than are now the case. Pacific Gas preferred is showing an improvement in price chiefly on the strength of the common stock and the known excellent financial condition of the gas company. The balance of the local stock list has no special features other than a marked steadiness in tone.

slipped from under the cushion. She smiled and said, in a low tone in good German, "Have you rowed on the Rhine, too?" and sprang ashore without giving me time to reply.

My heart beat with joy. Did she mean to intimate that she had guessed my secret? I felt that this was the beginning of a romantic adventure. I was so excited that I paid no attention to the meeting with the Robertses. I concealed my Heine more carefully and sat still in my boat, waiting to see what would happen next. I waited quite a while, but nobody came. I could see no one, but I heard them talking in the garden and could distinguish the voices of Bertha and her father mingling with other voices I did not recognize. Finally Bertha stepped out upon a terrace leading down to the lake with a young and very elegant gentleman, whom I guessed to be Mr. Roberts and who asked me in excellent Italian whether I would row him to Castagnola.

Castagnola being on my way back to Oria, I said I would. Then the little girl said in French: "Demain matin, a neuf heures, ici."

Presently the old gentleman appeared, with a proud and happy air, escorting a beautiful and elegant woman of about thirty, whom Bertha addressed as Miss Roberts. Miss Harriet did not appear, and I was rather glad of it, in view of the good looks of young Mr. Roberts.

When Mr. and Miss Roberts were in the boat and I could examine them more closely, the man's face displeased me greatly. He was certainly handsome, brown as an Arab, with great dark eyes and a short black beard, but he looked selfish, insolent and deceitful. He had a strange, rather harsh voice. Miss Roberts was a tall blonde, with languishing blue eyes and a soft, drawing voice.

As we were leaving the shore she turned to bid farewell to her friends with a sort of indolent, careless grace, while the man with much warmth called out again and again: "Till tomorrow! Till tomorrow!"

What followed filled me with amazement. They had barely ceased waving their farewells, when both faces assumed a cold and hard expression. When they were sure of not being heard from the shore they began an astonishing conversation in German, Miss Roberts declaring that she would go nowhere the next day and Mr. Roberts replying with an oath that if she did not he would beat her. Apparently she was accustomed to such threats, for without being at all disturbed by it, she began to taunt her companion on his lack of success with the Americans. Thus I learned that the old gentleman and his daughter were Americans, and the woman's next remark gave me their name. "I see well enough that Miss Forest has her suspicions. She will end by finding out who we are, and I, for my part, shall be glad of it."

With another oath he declared that this was impossible.

"Not if I tell her," she answered, with calm insolence.

Then followed a series of coarse recriminations in German, from which I soon gathered that there was an infamous plot on foot. It transpired that they were not English, that their name was not Roberts, that they were not brother and sister, nor even husband and wife, but a pair of vile adventurers, joined by an illicit bond that had grown hateful to both. The man was scheming to win the affections, the hand and, above all, the fortune of Miss Forest; and the woman was to aid him by worming her way into the good graces of the father, whom they spoke of as the professor.

When we reached Castagnola the man asked how much he owed me. I replied that I had already been paid, whereupon he turned his back on me and disappeared with his companion.

I at once hurried to a friend of mine in Cas-tagnola, told him what I had overheard, and described the pair. He recognized them by my description, and told me they had been living in Castagnola for a month or more, that the man passed himself off for a dealer in Oriental jewels, the woman meanwhile making acquaintances and acting as decoy. That it was rumored that he was a native of some Eastern country and was wanted by the Italian police for swindling.

Strange to say, I could not picture to myself Miss Forest's gratitude, but, instead, imagined the old gentleman's arms about my neck and his gray whiskers on my cheek. I was not yet so desperately in love as to enjoy the prospect of this chaste and hirsute embrace.

I was living at this time with my sister, a strong-minded maiden lady, who loved me like a mother, but without a mother's blindness.

I arrived home in a state of such agitation that her suspicions were at once aroused, and she had soon drawn the whole story from me; but I said as little as possible of Miss Forest and as much as possible of the Robertses. Apparently my sister did not quite approve of the noble role I was intending to play, for she said: "Of course you will not go tomorrow?"

"Not go? Of course I shall go. It is my duty as an honest man and a Christian."

She asked whether it was my duty to fall in love with every pretty girl I met and to run after her, adding that if it should be my duty as a Christian to bring Americans, Germans or Turks home to lunch the next day it would be her duty as a Christian to give them bread and water.

The next morning at nine I was at Villa Ceresia, where I found Miss Bertha in the garden waiting for me. She ran at once to call her father and sister. Miss Harriet looked charming in a costume of white serge trimmed with blue and a dear little blue cap. I felt a pain in my heart at the thought that this little cap might have been put on to captivate Mr. Roberts.

She bowed slightly, without speaking. It would have been impossible to take less notice of one, and yet I felt that it was not quite the greeting she would have bestowed upon a boatman. I also noticed that she had scarcely taken her seat when a rapid glance or two took in certain details of my dress, some intentional changes in my boatman's garb, my gold cuff buttons, for instance, and a ring set with a small diamond. She made no sign, but I was sure she had seen them. In my excitement I rowed so hard that her father and sister looked at me in surprise, but she, after that first glance, kept her eyes fixed upon Cavallino, where we had met the day before.

It was not until I began to row more slowly that our glances met; at once Lugano, Villa Ceresia, Cavallino, Professor Forest's gray whiskers, the whole visible universe, danced before my eyes.

They began to talk of the Robertses. Miss Harriet suggested that they should not stop at Castagnola for them, but Miss Bertha insisted, and her father agreed with her; the little girl had evidently been captivated by them. The father said that Mr. Roberts was an agreeable and cultivated man, and that his antique jewels were magnificent. From the old gentleman's enthusiasm I suspected that in his eyes Miss Roberts was a modern jewel still more magnificent than the old ones. As for Miss Harriet, she declared that she preferred Parisian to Egyptian jewels, and that she disliked Mr. Roberts both on his own account and because Miss Roberts was his sister. She had doubtless noticed that lady's designs upon her father, for she described her pitilessly as a lifeless, yellow-haired doll.

Bertha defended them warmly, and Mr. Forest, growling like a cross old bear, declared that he expected his daughter to treat his friend politely.

"I did not know that you considered them friends," said the girl, growing pale.

"I do," said the old gentleman, "and, besides, I am under great obligations to Mr. Roberts for information about Syrio-Phoenician ornaments."

Miss Harriet, evidently troubled, said no more, nor did she look at me again.

When we approached Castagnola, instead of making directly for the landing-place, I turned my boat in the direction of Oria, and tried to

These Remedies are the result of their Clinical, Hospital and Private Practice, and they have found from their years of experience with Children's Eyes, that two drops of Murine in each Eye of the Growing Child is of inestimable value. Murine is an Eye Tonic and they know, if it is used regularly, that it Tones the Eye of the Growing Child and in many instances obviates the use of Glasses, and is it not reasonable that Glasses when not required will retard the development of a young and growing Eye?

Murine, through its Tonic effect, Stimulates Healthy Circulation and thus promotes the normal development of the Eye. We do not believe there is a Mother who has used Murine in her own Eyes and in the Eyes of the members of her family who would be without it, or who is not willing to speak of its Merits as The Household Friend.

catch her eye, wishing to intimate that I did not mean to land at Castagnola without express orders from her. The professor noticed the change of direction, and pointed to the place where I was to land. I looked at Miss Harriet before obeying, waiting for her to speak. Finally our eyes met, and I saw that she understood. The beautiful blue eyes looked at me with some surprise, and it passed through my mind that she was wondering whether I had rowed upon the Thames also; but she said nothing, and I turned the boat toward Castagnola.

We waited several minutes, but the Robertses did not appear. Finally the old gentleman said that he and Bertha would go in search of them. Miss Harriet announced that she would wait in the boat.

My heart beat wildly. Without having received even a glance of encouragement, I resolved to speak.

As soon as the father and sister were out of sight, I said in French, "Mademoiselle, I can no longer deceive you."

"Ah!" she said quickly, "you are the Italian poet? Yes. I suspected as much yesterday," she exclaimed. "Why this comedy? I suppose you are a gentleman, sir. Was it courteous of you to make sport of us?" And she rose to leave the boat.

"Stay, mademoiselle! I had no desire to make sport of you, I assure you. It was a petty revenge," I added, with a smile. "You remember that you thought me a fisherman when you saw me mending my line? Your eyes showed disdain, and after seeing you I could not endure it."

"It was not disdain, sir, but doubt, and one may easily have more respect for an honest fisherman than for a deceiving poet."

"I did not intend to deceive you, mademoiselle, but to undeceive you, to show you that I was not so much your inferior as you supposed. My pride prompted me at first, but that was very soon succeeded by other feelings, and I am happy to be able to say that it may prove to your advantage to have met me."

"In what way, sir?" She was evidently startled and looked anxious for an explanation.

"Will you not be seated?"

She took her former seat, and after a moment's hesitation I continued, "I understand some English, mademoiselle, especially when spoken by Americans."

She started. "And you listened to what we said yesterday? That was hardly fair, sir." Her face expressed disapproval, though not unmixed with amusement.

"May I ask," I said timidly, "whether the Mr. Jack whom I resemble so much is, by any chance, a chimpanzee?"

She could not keep from laughing. "It would serve you right if he were," she said, "but he is not."

"Thank you, mademoiselle, and now listen to me. I want to give you some information about the Robertses."

She turned toward me eagerly.

"The man is a full-fledged scoundrel, and the woman his accomplice. They are not brother and sister, nor are they English, nor is Roberts their name. The man is scheming to marry you."

"How did you learn this?" Evidently she still had her doubts about me.

"I learned it yesterday while rowing them from Lugano to Castagnola. They spoke only of you. It is thus that I learned your name and your nationality. I know, Miss Forest, that you must be asking yourself whether you ought to believe an utter stranger."

She said nothing. I trembled.

"Trust me!" I exclaimed. "I implore you to trust me. Can you not see, can you not feel that I am telling you the truth? Better far to leave you at once, and never see you again, than have you think me an impostor! Addio, signorina."

I had one foot upon the shore, resolved to go, without a thought for my boat.

"Stay," said Miss Forest, in a low, barely audible voice. "I do believe you."

I sat down in the prow of the boat, murmuring, "I thank you."

In the silence that followed we heard the footsteps of the professor and Bertha, who were returning.

"Heaven be praised!" said Miss Harriet. "They are alone. I must speak to you again, but not now."

At this moment Mr. Forest and his daughter appeared on the shore, but they were not alone. Mr. Roberts, in elegant outing costume, accompanied them. He greeted Miss Harriet, adding, "I am sorry to say that my sister is not well; she sends her regrets."

Handsome and privileged as he was to sit beside Miss Harriet, I would not have changed places with him. Nothing could be more icy than her demeanor.

He seemed not to notice it, but her father was evidently annoyed, and exerted himself to be as polite as possible to him. Miss Harriet looked at me, and our eyes spoke. I was happy that the others still thought me a boatman, that she knew and was silent.

Presently Mr. Roberts said, "A good boat. I should like to own it."

"Buy it," said Miss Harriet, with an imperceptible smile.

"I might do that, but I should certainly not hire the boatman. He's a disagreeable fellow. You agree with me, Miss Harriet?"

She blushed and I fear I blushed, too. I did not dare look at her, but I heard her answer playfully, "Treat him with respect, please. He is our boatman, not yours."

"Oh, yes, I'll treat him with respect," with a sneer. "But do you really like him?"

"I believe him to be an honest man, and honesty is what I admire above every other quality." The blue eyes turned to me, as if to say, "Are you content?"

And I was content. What a fine, frank creature she was! Proud and happy would the man be who could win her.

Nothing daunted by her coldness, Mr. Roberts went on talking volubly to her, to her father, to Bertha, talking about many things, but above all about himself, his qualities and his defects, his pursuits and prospects.

Meanwhile we had reached Oria. Mr. Forest proposed that they should walk to San Mamette, but when the rest had gone ashore, Miss Harriet announced that she preferred going by boat.

Roberts was about to step back into the boat, but Miss Harriet begged him to accompany her father, and he dared not refuse.

Overjoyed, I began to thank her, but she stopped me, saying that she had something to ask me. Had I discovered any particular intentions on the part of Miss Roberts? That was all she said, but I understood, and answered guardedly that, apparently, it was intended that Miss Roberts should ensnare someone by her fascinations.

Meanwhile we were passing my little villa, and looking up I saw my sister half concealed behind some shrubbery, watching me and my companion with stern disapproval.

"Your villa?" asked Miss Forest. "What a lovely spot!"

I told her how happy I should be if she would go ashore for a few moments and allow me to show her my flowers and my books, and to tell her some of the dreams I dreamed as I watched the mountain and the lake.

"I must not," she said; and then: "It is perhaps as well not to know each other better, for we shall hardly meet again. I see an orange tree in your garden. Will you give me a little sprig?"

"Not meet again?" I cried, forgetting to row. She did not answer, and seemed embarrassed.

Then after a moment's silence she smiled. "What was it my father said yesterday? Remare, remare! Oh, I wish I could take my father away from here tomorrow, that I could make him believe the horrible tale you have told me!"

"And if you could, would you be willing to leave tomorrow?"

"It would be best so."

"And where would you go?"

"To America."

"And if I could help you to make him believe what I have told you, would you feel grateful to me, would you remember me when you are once more in America?"

She silently put out her hand, which I seized in both of mine, letting go the oars.

"I will help you, Miss Forest, whatever that help may cost me." And not caring who might see me, I pressed my lips for one moment upon the little white hand all cold with emotion.

"It is strange," she said, with an unsteady smile, "that I do not even know your name."

I told her.

"Thank you," she said simply. "And now we will say farewell before the others come back."

"May I not return to Lugano with you?"

"It is better to part here. We can get a man to bring your boat back. Give me the orange sprig and go."

In a trembling voice I asked whether the sprig might not some day put forth flowers for a wreath. Perhaps she did not understand, perhaps she thought it a mere poet's phrase. At all events she did not answer.

"Addio," said I. She bent her head and stepped ashore.

In a few moments we reached the inn where the party were to lunch. Saying to Professor Forest that I would call for them in an hour, I hurried home, changed my clothes, put a sprig of orange in my buttonhole and had myself rowed back to the inn. I sent my card up to Professor Forest, and, on being shown in, I begged his pardon, in wretched English, for having resorted to an innocent ruse to induce them to make use of my boat and services.

Professor Forest was confused and evidently at a loss whether to thank or upbraid me. Miss Harriet thanked me with a sweet smile. Miss Bertha looked on in open-mouthed amazement.

Then I turned to Roberts, who was also looking on in astonishment not unmixed with uneasiness and pretending not to recognize me.

"Sir," said I, "you treated the boatman with scant courtesy this morning, but knowing who you are, I am inclined to deal generously with you and do you a slight service. Your wife sends you word that she wishes you to return to Lugano at once."

"My wife!" answered the scoundrel. "I have no wife; nor have I the pleasure of your acquaintance."

"Sprechen sie Deutsch, mein Herr?" said I in a firm voice.

He shrugged his shoulders. "The poor fellow is mad. He is talking to me in some language I do not understand."

I looked at my watch, and continued in German: "You have five minutes in which to catch the boat. If you stay here I promise you an introduction to the police, who have long desired to meet you."

"Das ist nicht wahr!" he exclaimed.

I turned to Professor Forest with a smile.

"He seems to speak the language he does not understand."

The fellow, seeing that he had betrayed himself, began to curse me in some unknown tongue.

Through the open windows I could hear the boat approaching. "You have two minutes," I said.

He seized his hat, and, crying to Professor Forest, "I will explain at Lugano!" disappeared.

Professor Forest neither put his arms about my neck nor his whiskers on my cheek. His idyl was interrupted as well as mine. But Miss Harriet's eyes shone with gratitude and admiration.

"We will go back to Lugano at once," said Mr. Forest.

I offered my boat, but the offer was somewhat curtly declined. I did not insist. Miss Harriet's eyes mutely apologized for her father's rudeness.

They went toward the door, and I followed with a heavy heart. The hallway was narrow and dark. In silence I took the sprig of orange from my buttonhole and handed it to Miss Harriet. In silence she accepted it, broke off a leaf, put it to her lips, gave it to me and slipped the rest in her bosom. I sought her hand and pressed it; the pressure was returned, and as she withdrew it I saw tears in her eyes.

Professor Forest, standing at the entrance, turned to bid me farewell, saying stiffly: "I am indebted to you, sir."

Miss Harriet said nothing. But the look she gave me went to my heart. There are times when it still hurts.

I never again saw or heard of Miss Harriet. I should be glad if these lines might cross the friend to whom she has related this episode. And I would ask this unknown friend to show her this tale, and to tell her that the orange leaf she kissed is still cherished, together with a silver coin, in the little wave-washed villa at the foot of the mountain covered with olive, vine and laurel.

"So you are the applicant for the position of typewriter?"

"Yes, sir."

"But your hands do not look as if they'd ever touched a typewriter."

"They haven't, sir; I learned at a correspondence school!"

A Storekeeper Says:

"A lady came into my store lately and said:

"I have been using a New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove all winter in my apartment. I want one now for my summer home. I think these oil stoves are wonderful. If only women knew what a comfort they are, they would all have one. I spoke about my stove to a lot of my friends, and they were astonished. They thought that there was smell and smoke from an oil stove, and that it heated a room just like any other stove. I told them of my experience, and one after another they got one, and now, not one of them would give hers up for five times its cost."

The lady who said this had thought an oil stove was all right for quickly heating milk for a baby, or boiling a kettle of water, or to make coffee quickly in the morning, but she never dreamed of using it for difficult or heavy cooking. Now—she knows.

Do you really appreciate what a New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove means to you? No more coal to carry, no more coming to the dinner table so tired out that you can't eat. Just light a Perfection Stove and immediately the heat from an intense blue flame shoots up to the bottom of pot, kettle or oven. But the room isn't heated. There is no smoke, no smell, no outside heat, no drudgery in the kitchen where one of these stoves is used.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

New Perfection WICK BLUE FLAME Oil Cook-stove

It has a Cabinet Top with a shelf for keeping plates and food hot. The nickel finish, with the bright blue of the chimneys, makes the stove ornamental and attractive. Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without Cabinet.

A DAINY TOILET ARTICLE

Every lady who desires to keep up her attractive appearance, while at the Theatre, attending Receptions, when shopping, while traveling and on all occasions should carry in her purse a booklet of Gouraud's Oriental Beauty Leaves. This is a dainty little booklet of exquisitely perfumed powdered leaves which are easily removed and applied to the skin. It is invaluable when the face becomes moist and flushed and is far superior to a powder puff as it does not spill and soil the clothes. It removes dirt, soot and grease from the face, imparting a cool delicate bloom to the complexion. Sent anywhere on receipt of Ten Cents in stamps or coin. F. T. Auto Notes

According to E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Company, marked advances toward removing suspicion from stock car races are being made in the East and greater scrutiny is being exercised this year than ever before to see that every car entered in such events is of genuine stock design and assemblage.

The Lozier Company expects to compete in stock car events this year, and feels that the Racing Board will give it ample protection against cars which are not legitimately stock models. If at any time it is felt that any car which has competed has not complied with stock car requirements a demand will be made to the Technical Committee to have the car, at the conclusion of the race, put through a thorough technical examination.

According to advices received by the local branch of the Diamond Rubber Co. three of the eight perfect score cars in the Atlanta to New York good roads tour made the run on Diamond tires.

The Lozier racing campaign for 1911 will be inaugurated on August 27 at the Elgin National Trophy Race. Long distance racing has been the Lozier specialty; it being the belief of the Lozier organization that while the public is attracted by a speed performance it is only where speed is coupled with endurance that racing benefits the manufacturer to the greatest extent. For this season Lozier cars have not been entered in short distance events, although they have been contestants and winners in nearly all of the big twenty-four-hour races and have been prominent contenders in many long distance road races.

Representatives of the E. R. Thomas Motor Company from all parts of the country held their annual convention in Buffalo last week. The object was to bring about a feeling of intelligent understanding and good will between factory and agents so that each will have a broad sympathy for the work of the other; also to send every dealer away from the factory absolutely convinced of the superiority of the Thomas product, accomplishing this result by logical demonstration and a plain statement of facts.

H. E. Doty, assistant Pacific Coast manager of the White Company, accompanied by his family, made a run recently over La Honda Grade to the Big Trees in a White Gasoline Car. The machine took the whole distance without one adjustment, the only time that Doty got out of the car being for a chicken dinner. The road between Half Moon Bay and La Honda was found in poor condition, being filled with ruts that the deep dust covered and made it impossible to see.

Fred Wagner who has started on the trans-continental tour in an Auburn Car carries a supply of Monogram Oil. This lubricant will be used throughout the trip.

Hector McKenzie, a well known autoist and business man, has left for a two weeks' tour of Southern California in his Packard machine.

The Chalmers "30" which acted as official pathfinder for this year's Glidden Tour and then entered the long strenuous grind as a contestant, has just added fresh honors to its reputation. Used by M. H. Maxwell, secretary of the Cleveland Automobile Club, it has just completed the long three days' reliability run with a perfect score.

By performing practically every service to which the higher powered cars are put the Hupmobile has successfully demonstrated the possibilities of the small type cars. Daily almost this little machine is found filling some new field of service where a combination of speed and endurance is required. The latest use to which it has been put is that of a touring machine for European traveling.

S. G. Chapman is in receipt of word stating that the Owen car ended a most remarkable run with a perfect score in the three day reliability run of the Cleveland Automobile Club. A large part of the distance was made in a drizzling rain and under most trying conditions.

1911 CHALMERS MOTOR CARS

WILL ARRIVE AUGUST 15th

Refined But Practically Unchanged 1909 and 1910 Good Enough

The Chalmers cars come from a factory producing quality and not quantity. THE CHALMERS PRINCIPLE is not to make as many cars as possible, but TO MAKE EACH INDIVIDUAL CAR AS GOOD AS POSSIBLE.

We regret that we were not able to furnish 1909 and 1910 models to all who wanted them, and while we fear that some were offended when told that they could not get the cars they wanted, we assure every one that it is much harder to tell a prospective buyer that he cannot have the car than it is to show him why he should have one.

It is possible that the Chalmers factory could build a sufficient number of cars to take care of every available customer, but in so doing they would, like a large number of other factories, sacrifice quality for quantity, and every car sold would not make a customer for another, as has been our experience during the past two years.

A few cars are still available for September delivery.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco. Action No. 22691.

MRS. KATHERINE SINCLAIR and JOHN WILLIAM SINCLAIR, Plaintiffs, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest In, or lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The people of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interests in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Mrs. Katherine Sinclair and John William Sinclair, plaintiffs, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Greenwich street, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-two (122) feet, four (4) inches westerly from the westerly line of Scott street; running thence westerly and along the said southerly line of Greenwich street fifty-three (53) feet, seven (7) inches; thence at right angles southerly eighty-two (82) feet; thence at right angles easterly forty-three (43) feet, five (5) inches; thence northeasterly fifteen (15) feet, thence easterly seven (7) feet, eight (8) inches; and thence at right angles northerly sixty-eight (68) feet, nine (9) inches to the southerly line of Greenwich street and the point of commencement.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute; that their title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

Witness my hand and seal of said Court this 19th day of August, A. D. 1910.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Department No. 1, No. 22,257.

ELISABETH MILLS REID and OGDEN MILLS, Plaintiffs, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Elisabeth Mills Reid and Ogdan Mills, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

First Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Bush Street with the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence easterly along said northerly line of Bush Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence northerly and at right angles to said northerly line of Bush Street one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence westerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course sixty-seven (67) feet and six (6) inches; running thence northerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course twenty-two (22) feet; running thence westerly and at right angles to the last mentioned course seventy (70) feet to the easterly line of Montgomery Street; and running thence southerly along said easterly line of Montgomery Street one hundred and fifty-nine (159) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement.

Second Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Bush Street, distant thereon one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches easterly from the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Bush Street with the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence easterly and along the said northerly line of Bush Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; running thence at right angles northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; running thence at right angles westerly sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; and running thence at right angles southerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement; being a part of Fifty Vara Lot Number Two Hundred and Three (203).

Third Parcel—An undivided one-half of that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Laura Place, distant thereon one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly from the southerly line of Pine Street, and which point is also eighty-seven (87) feet and six (6) inches easterly from the easterly line of Montgomery Street; running thence southerly and along said easterly line of Laura Place and parallel with the easterly line of Montgomery Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches; running thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with the easterly line of Montgomery Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle westerly seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches to the easterly line of Laura Place and point of commencement; being part of Fifty Vara Lots Numbers Two Hundred and Two (202) and Two Hundred and Fifty-five (255); subject, however, to all the terms, conditions, covenants and agreements contained in that certain indenture made on the 11th day of December, 1906, by and between Exchange Realty Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of California, having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and D. O. Mills and Ogdan Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid (wife of Whitelaw Reid), and recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 5th day of February, 1907, in Liber 64 of Deeds, at page 10, New Series.

Fourth Parcel—An undivided one-fourth of that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly on a perpendicular line drawn from a point on the southerly line of Pine Street one hundred and sixty-five (165) feet easterly from the easterly line of Montgomery Street, which point of commencement is also seventy-seven (77) feet and six (6) inches easterly on a perpendicular line drawn from a point on the easterly line of Laura Place one hundred and twelve (112) feet and six (6) inches southerly from the southerly line of Pine Street; running thence southerly and parallel with Laura Place twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly and parallel with Pine Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly and parallel with Laura Place twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly twenty-five (25) feet to the point of commencement; being part of Fifty Vara Lot Number Two Hundred and Two (202); subject, however, to all the terms, conditions, covenants and agreements contained in that certain indenture made on the 11th day of December, 1906, by and between Exchange Realty Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of California, having its principal place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and D. O. Mills and Ogdan Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid (wife of Whitelaw Reid), and recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 5th day of February, 1907, in Liber 56 of Deeds, at page 371, New Series.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute; that their title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein and have such other relief as may be met in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 16th day of July, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By M. P. BRUTON, Deputy Clerk.

Memorandum—The first publication of this summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 23rd day of July, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff: Names, None; Addresses, None.

The Author of "Seven Days"

ough the name Mary Roberts Rinehart is a relatively new addition to the list of fiction writers Mrs. Rinehart has set herself a pace and has already brought her well up towards front rank of that division of the procession which she has chosen to march. Her "Circular Case" was an immediate success and when followed it with "The Man in Lower Ten" it was evident that it was not to accident that must ascribe the ingenuity of her plots and complications. Her next venture, "When a Man Dies," a bit of light comedy, has proved, in dramatized form, "Seven Days," to be one of season's theatrical successes and now comes "The Window at the White Cat," another tangle of sensations and surprises. "The Window at the White Cat" opens upon the secrets of a corrupt political ring, but the author touches but lightly politics. The White Cat was an informal club well known to the politicians of both state and municipality, as well as to the police department and the newspaper world, but to very few others. The men who consorted there made it their business to attend strictly to their own affairs and it was a safe haven, a port of refuge for occasions when it was desirable for them to disappear for a time. Fleming, the treasurer of the club, a widower with one grown daughter who loved him to be a man of regular and exemplary habits, had disappeared. After ten days of suspense during which various trifling circumstances occurring in the house added to her affliction, she applied to a lawyer for advice. Knox happened to be the attorney for Miss Fleming's two maiden aunts, women well to do in the world though the elder was miserly in the extreme and Miss Jane, then sixty-five years of age, had never dared to possess her own soul. Knox advised Miss Fleming to go to her aunts to say nothing of her father's absence. He, however, was summoned to make still another change in Miss Letitia's will and thus he too was dominated under the Maitland roof for that night. Letitia confided to him that several of her most valuable unset pearls which she kept fully hidden had been abstracted, but the disappearance of the jewels became a trifling circumstance when, late in the night, Harry Ward, the son of a cousin of the old ladies who lived in his home with them and who was also Fleming's fiance and her father's private secretary, arrived and attempted to make entrance through a window in the absence of his key and was mistaken for a burglar by the alert Knox. Arrived at mutual understanding, Wardrop demanded the satchel which he claimed to have deposited on the doorstep while using means of ingress but Knox not only refused all knowledge of the property but stated that when he reached the vestibule he found the door ajar. Next morning the Maitland household was thrown into consternation by the discovery that the meek and gentle Aunt Jane had disappeared, though not an article of her clothing had gone with her. That she neither had nor could have gone on her own accord was an assured certainty, yet how she could have been kidnapped, where secluded or for what motive was more than any one could conjecture. The unraveling of these and other mysteries came through the activities of one Burton, a newspaper reporter. As the essence of a mystery tale is the preservation of the secret until the end the reader must be left to discover the whys and wherefores for himself but for those who enjoy the unraveling of complications "The Window at the White Cat" will afford occupation enough. A Disappointing Book

Horace A. Taylor's "Tales of Travel" is a distinct disappointment. In the first place he tells no tales and in the second, though he has traveled much both at home and abroad he seems to have been gifted with neither the faculty of observation nor the power of expression. There is neither sparkle nor spontaneity nor even much information in what he has to tell of his trip across the continent, his sojourn in Japan, China, India, Egypt, the Holy Land; the stock sights and scenes of Europe or his return voyage across the Atlantic. Mr. Taylor might have written an excellent guide book for his is the type of mind which occupies itself with such matters as the length of routes, the comfort of accommodations, price lists and travelers' necessities. Evidently he has stored his own mind with pleasant memories but the difficulty lies in sharing his pleasures with others. He does not know how to draw us into his fireside circle, though we must thank him for his evident good will and kindly intention, as well as for the fact that his volume is NOT illustrated. Far too often we have insult added to injury by the addition of snap shots and full page pictures of every interesting site and scene marred by "the author," his family or his party, mayhap his dog and his donkey, posed in the foreground. Mr. Taylor's book is well written in the sense that it is freer from grammatical and rhetorical blemishes than nine-tenths of the products of the modern press, but it really was not worth the labor he expended in its production. A Great Man's Mother

When Thomas Carlyle's mother was nearing the end of her life, he sent her this letter, which told of the beautiful years of their love: "Dear old mother, weak and sick and dear to me, what a day this has been in my solitary thought! For, except a few words to Jane, I have not spoken to anyone, nor, indeed, hardly seen anyone, it being dusk and dark before I went out—a dim, silent Sabbath day, the sky foggy, dark with damp, and a universal stillness the consequence; and it is this day gone fifty-eight years that I was born. And my poor mother! Well, we are all in God's hands. Surely God is good. Surely we ought to trust Him, or what is there for the sons of men? Oh my dear mother, let it ever be a comfort to you, however weak you are, that you did your part honorably and well while in strength, and were a noble mother to me and to us all. I am now myself grown old, and have had various things to do and suffer for so many years; but there is nothing I ever had to be so much thankful for as for the mother I had. That is a truth which I know well, and perhaps this day again it may be some comfort to you. Yes, surely, for, if there has been any good in the things I have uttered in the world's hearing, it was your voice essentially that was speaking through me; essentially what you and my brave father meant and taught me to mean, this was the purport of all I spoke and wrote. And if in the few years that may remain to me I am to get any more written for the world, the essence of it, so far as it is worthy and good, will still be yours. May God reward you, dearest mother, for all you have done for me. I never can. Ah, no! but will think of it with gratitude and pious love so long as I have the power of thinking, and I will pray God's blessing on you, now and always, and will write no more on that at present, for it is better for me to be silent."

They were having tea on the lawn. "How many lumps of sugar?" inquired the hostess. "Two lumps," answered the young man, "and only one caterpillar, if you please."

Thousand Oaks

Berkeley

Thousand Oaks, that Berkeley wanted for its city park and playground, is for sale in villa homesites.

No residence section in the State of California offers the charm and natural grandeur found at this magnificent spot in North Berkeley.

The Southern Pacific's new electric ferry system will open this section of Berkeley for the first time. Within two blocks of the entrance to Thousand Oaks a $25,000 station is to be built. At this station you can entrain for the city via three different routes. In the early spring these trains start running and then the prices will be at least twice what they are to-day.

Right now you can purchase a villa homesite in Thousand Oaks at a very reasonable price and on exceptionally easy terms.

No homesite less than 50 feet frontage; no stores nor flats; no orientals; no interest nor taxes for two years; your money returned at 6 per cent in case of death, are only a few of the inducements.

Come out and see the majestic oaks and moss covered rocks; come and see the prettiest place in the bay district to build a Chalet or Bungalow. Come while the prices are low. Call on or address either office and we will take you out in a machine.

Our Unsmirchable Despot

Our thrifty contemporary the Boughten Bulletin waxes indignant at what it conceives to be a dastardly attempt to tarnish the fair fame of that great and good man Colonel Theodore Roosevelt. Speaking of the charge that when the Colonel was President Gumshoe Burns carried a message from him to a federal grand jury to the effect that it would please him to have Dr. Perrin indicted the Bulletin says: "It is unbelievable that the attempt to besmirch Theodore Roosevelt will be justified even by the few whose minds have been twisted by the mad fever of accumulation." Our contemporary is laboring under a grievous misconception. Admitting that Colonel Roosevelt did send the message which is reported to have influenced a grand jury it is not to be considered to his discredit. Colonel Roosevelt as the Bulletin ought to know is not bound by any of the conventions of civilized society. Formerly as President of the United States, and now as director-general of politics, business and morals, his will in all matters affecting our welfare is supreme. And his hold on our confidence and esteem is as firm as his grasp on our imagination. It is his inalienable prerogative to determine what the "public good" is and how it shall be advanced. So why get agitated about the message to the grand jury? Has the Bulletin forgotten the message to the jury that tried those undesirable citizens Moyer and Heywood? The Colonel did not intimate merely that he would like to have those unspeakable undesirables indicted. They were under indictment when he took a belated hand in the case. He wanted them hanged. And when he uttered his sentiment nobody shuddered—none but the prisoners at the bar. The Bulletin seems to have forgotten that Colonel Roosevelt was an absolutely lawless president with the consent of the people and that the very lawlessness of him was his most captivating quality. The people dearly love a despot as Mr. Roosevelt very well knows. He has not studied the career of his favorite hero in vain. So it is absurd to assume that the Colonel is in any danger of being besmirched by revelations of his doings along the line that was pursued by his illustrious prototype of ancient Rome. Why the Colonel has always been waist deep in transactions similar to the one that our boughten contemporary has been ranting about. Was it not the Colonel that excited alarm in all newspaperdom by his despotic attempt to railroad the editors of the New York World and Indianapolis News to jail for lese majeste? And have we forgotten the messages sent by the Colonel in response to the earnest solicitations of his San Francisco friends when they were manufacturing public sentiment and intimidating juries? Evidently the editor of our contemporary has been nodding. For he has implied that he considers it most discreditable to attempt to influence juries by subterranean methods, the very methods that once received the tribute of his approval, and in the practice of which he made Colonel Roosevelt his accomplice. Nevertheless he need not be anxious about the reputation of our first citizen. Government in this country is still identified with Roosevelt caprice, and the Colonel stands like the firm rock that in the midocean braves the war of whirlwinds and the dash of the waves.

The Dictatorship

A year ago the few that suggested the possibility of a dictatorship being shortly established in this country were looked upon as sinister alarmists and accused of an unholy desire to weaken the influence of Theodore Roosevelt. The supposition was that they were appealing to a strong patriotic sentiment that abhors the idea of subordinating the institutions of the country to the will of any man. And it was also supposed that they were either insincere or foolish. It will be remembered that when Colonel Henry Watterson soberly discussed what he conceived to be the tendency of the times and pointed to the Roosevelt dictatorship as a not improbable consummation he was pooh-poohed in many quarters and bitterly denounced in others. It will also be remembered that in the days ago Colonel Roosevelt appeared to regard the suggestion that he was shrewdly cultivating in the public a taste for strong meat as a wicked imputation inspired by the envy and hatred of his enemies. All of which they who are interested in the phenomenon of the ebb and flow of public opinion will now find it worth their while to ponder. The Roosevelt boom is on again, and apparently the people are in a receptive mood. The press of Europe viewing the situation in the light of history has not the slightest doubt of the Colonel's ambition. The men in this country who are now looking forward to the Colonel's return to power are not the Colonel's enemies. They are his warmest and most intimate friends. According to their view of things he is the logical man for the job; the country needs him because the country is in need of a strong arm to curb the powers of iniquity; which means of course that we need a President who will not be too much of a stickler for the law. And what sayeth the Colonel apropos of these sentiments? Does he wax indignant? Does he ask to be delivered from the friends who are thus employing what he once pronounced the ammunition of his enemies? Not at all. The public prints tell us that when the subject is broached in his private car he reproves his friends and deprecates the topic. With something of the coyness of Caesar the Colonel sidesteps the question of the hour. And meanwhile the necessity of him seems to be growing more apparent every minute. The Colonel has the floor, and as we listen to him we perceive that the times are deplorably out of joint. We perceive also that like a true patriot he is bent on setting them right. The politicians are fighting him, and the more they fight the greater the volume of water they put on his wheel. For him opposition is a source of inspiration: what makes others stumble is for him the occasion of his highest triumphs. We are witnessing the working of natural laws fixed in the condition of things; to contend against them is like reviving the old battle of the Titans against the gods. The members of the Old Guard who are maneuvering for control of the situation in New York may succeed in balking our ambitious ex-President in that small field; but when we consider the whole scope of his operations we see that he can well afford to suffer a repulse in the province on the Eastern verge of the vast territory in which he has intrenched himself.

A Humorist Who is Funny

Though a humorist John Kendrick Bangs is never so humorous as when he is most serious. Witness for example his article in the August Smart Set, advising the literary men of America to remove the bushes from their light, and reproaching them for their modesty. He says that like somnolentists they are "too coy with their horn." This is exquisite humor, though absolutely of the unconscious variety. "We are plunging along the highway of national greatness," says Bangs, "without sufficiently notifying the rest of the world of our greatness thereon." Thus we find the humorist affecting in all seriousness to be unaware of the log-rolling and mutual admiration societies that abound in our native field of literature. He informs us that we are no longer in the fledgling literary stage as we appeared to be in the days when all we had to show along literary lines were a few shelves full of poetry and essays by Longfellow and Emerson "and some clever but wholly provincial fiction writers like Edgar Allan Poe and James Fennimore Cooper and Washington Irving and Nathaniel Hawthorne." Indeed we are not in the fledgling state. Literature in America has taken wings and has soared into the empyrean from the depths of intellectual life. It is becoming almost the sole business of the nation. We have schools of literature in every State, and no mere provincial writers in any one of them. Metropolitan artists are pounding along the beaten paths of literature from Maine to California. Long since we substituted the Richard Harding Davis style of fiction for the Edgar Allan Poe brand, and our essayists of the Elber Hubbard school are turning out their ware with an energy unprecedented in the history of literature. And assuredly the fame of contemporary producers of belles lettres is not neglected at home. So numerous are their readers and admirers on their native soil that there is really no need of establishing markets abroad where the benighted lovers of books are still preoccupied with the kind of literature that was produced by the provincial Poe, a fact that should be a source of some consolation to Mr. Bangs in his melancholy induced by foreign ignorance of the progress our literature has made. The truth is that Poe is still worshipped abroad as one of the great artists, not merely of American literature, but of all modern literature. English critics who have not yet discovered some of the novelists that Mr. Bangs reads declare that the multi-form genius of Poe has proved a dominant influence on all European literature. And singularly enough these foreign critics though they recognize Poe as a master of the short story, assert that it is as a poet that he wears the greenest bays. They tell us that this man whom Mr. Bangs describes a "provincial writer of fiction" has been read and imitated throughout the world, and that all the mystics and decadents and symbolists of today are disciples of Poe. Mr. Bangs be disinclined to believe these admirers of Poe he might profitably examine the evidence on which they base their assertions. We feel quite certain that if he could do so the result would be that instead of lamenting the narrowness of the fame of his contemporaries he would be reflecting with pride on the glory that was won for American literature by the man who has yet to be discovered by his countrymen.

On Ethical Expert

Professor Edward Alsworth Ross, of the University of Wisconsin, known to idolatrous undergraduates and half-educated magazines and newspaper editors as an ethical expert has brought out a new volume of his views and speculations on politics and sociology. It is called "Latter Day Saints and Sinners." In this book Professor Ross acquaints us with what he conceives to be an important discovery, that of the birth of new sins in the world. The old kinds of sin, he tells us, were for the most part personal and direct, while the new kinds are rather social. Burglary and murder he mentions as examples of the ancient sin, while graft and bad sanitation are declared to be types of the newer sin. Professor Ross has been too long preoccupied with the present. He ought to give ear to the "voice sounding across the centuries," and learn from history that it is a kind of Newgate calendar containing a register of the crimes that man has inflicted on his fellow-men. It is amusing to find this pretentious school teacher affecting the airs of a philosopher in blissful ignorance of the proofs that he gives of his incompetency to discuss the only subject on which he claims to be an expert. If Professor Ross had grounded himself in the only kind of philosophy that teaches by example he would know that "graft" is only a new name for one of the most ancient of practices. We commend to this half-baked philosopher, one of his contemporaries, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, from whom he might derive a hint of what history teaches us about all kinds of sin. We quote from memory:

Who knows but that the secret hid
Under Cheops' pyramid
Is that the contractor did
Cheops out of several millions?
Or that Joseph's sudden rise
To controller of supplies
Was a fraud of mighty size
On King Pharaoh's swart civilians?
As it was in the beginning
Is today official sinning
And will be for ever more.

The kind of wrongdoing, Professor Ross tells us, from which we most suffer today, may be found in abuse of commercial and professional relations. We are at the mercy of the crooked merchant and the knavish doctor of whom men were independent in ancient times. Professor Ross ought to make inquiries as to why the merchants of Babylon were treated as outcasts, and why Cato objected to Greek doctors in Rome and wrote out prescriptions for the members of his own family. As to the modernness of the evils of bad sanitation, for information on this subject he should consult the legend of the labors of Hercules. It will certainly interest him to learn that the stables where the Argonaut king kept his three thousand head of cattle had not been cleaned in thirty years when Hercules turned the river Alpheus into them. We earnestly hope that Professor Ross will endeavor to complete his education before writing any more books. For we believe that as at present circumstanced he is a type of one of the worst kinds of what may be accurately described as modern sin. We agree with him that among the modern sinners is the editor who deliberately deceives the public, but we class with this sinner the dogmatic college professor whose intellectual arrogance is an obstacle to intellectual advancement. Dogmatism is a grievous sin when indulged in by men who have been certified to the mob as competent teachers.

The Spirit of the Times

"Christianity," says a contemporary, "is on the defensive." Which is quite true; but what is there of any importance that is not on the defensive? This is an age of tremendous intellectual, moral and physical tumult, the public mind has been awakened to that constantly recurring scepticism which is the first condition of true philosophical inquiry, doubt being the parent of investigation, the precursor of knowledge. Christianity is not alone at the centre of the current hurly-burly. Philosophers are challenging the old philosophies, scientists are abandoning old landmarks, inventors are changing the old methods and processes of securing material results, and politicians and statesmen are flouting old maxims of law and justice and rejecting the very fundamentals of government. The popular supposition is that we have worshipped constitutional and religious fetishes too long, that we have been maintaining institutions merely because they are venerable, and accepting theories of government and religion merely because they have the sanction of great names. So every institution and theory is on trial. The demand for innovation and experiment is universal. The attitude of reformers toward Christianity is the same as their attitude toward everything else. They insist that it is behind the times, and therefore they repudiate its dogmas, laugh at its miracles, deride its claims of supernatural origin and scoff at the majestic personages of its ancient history. Have they found some higher and better standard of action than Christianity affords? This is a question of secondary importance. The prevailing notion seems to be that the time to design a new edifice is after the old one has been destroyed.

As They Passed By

We passed upon the oaken stair,
With never a bow or smile;
And I coolly gazed in her eyes so rare,
Though my heart beat fast the while.
Ah, why was it thus that she walked away.
Why did I my feelings smother?
You see, there was nothing that I could say,
For we didn't know each other.

Perspective Impressions

It is well to remember that the unexpected is what generally happens in politics.

So President Taft told Mayor McCarthy that Garfield's Hetch-Hetchy permit was not worth the paper it was written on! Well the readers of Town Talk were told the same thing when the permit was issued.

Our peripatetic ex-President has once more dissented from the Supreme Court of the United States on a question of constitutional law. It is refreshing to reflect that between God and the Colonel there is still unanimity of opinion.

President Taft, good amiable man, seems to have resolved to do the impossible.

It is becoming more apparent every day that by 1912 Theodore Roosevelt will be the only living embodiment of the principles of the Republican party. He is making them all in his own private factory.

We are told by the Call that Calhoun's attorneys were exemplary in their behaviour on their appearance in court this week. So was Judge Lawlor. He had nothing to offer in the way of campaign literature.

President Taft having suggested "economy in government expenditure" as a new issue, the Outlook takes occasion to point out that his predecessor was on the point of solving that problem along with all the others. This would seem incredible in view of the enormous extravagance of his predecessor's administration were it not for the fact that his predecessor is the contributing editor. He knows.

Some of our dailies seem to be under the impression that Theodore II is earning a salary as a freak in a carpet store.

Siftings from Many Sources

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over.

Sir Ernest Cassel's Charity

Sir Ernest Cassel who was financial adviser to the late King Edward, has donated one million dollars as a philanthropic fund to help needy English workers seeking employment in Germany and needy Germans seeking work in England. The endowment is made as a memorial to King Edward and with the hope that it will promote Anglo-German peace. The King and Queen of England, the Queen Mother and the Emperor and Empress of Germany will act as patrons of the fund. This is not Cassel's first philanthropical contribution. In 1902 he turned over to King Edward one million dollars for the establishment of a tuberculosis sanitarium. Despite his charities Sir Edward Cassel is not popular in England. The royal favor which he enjoyed more signally than anybody except Mrs. Keppel made him very unpopular with less successful courtiers. Mrs. Keppel said when the late king died that there would be a slump in Keppels and Cassels and she spoke the truth.

The Canalejas Program

The Saturday Review of London has no sympathy for Premier Canalejas of Spain in his controversy with the Vatican. It accuses him of "flouting the Pope in M. Combes' cast-off clothes" and finds that he "is much more concerned with annoying and embarrassing the Pope than with the relief of non-Catholic consciences." "The wretched truth is," says the Saturday Review, "that this far-trumpeted crusade in the sacred names of liberty and justice is a mere parliamentary move to brace together the loosely knit groups who form the Liberal majority." Continuing the same authority says: "Apparently the Prime Minister is prepared to go the whole French hog—the whole unclean, greedy animal which has rooted up and devoured the fairest and holiest treasures of the church's eldest daughter. We must compel ourselves in charity to assume that Senor Canalejas is determined to cease understudying his French masters for the last act of the sordid drama, and that he will not, after buying votes by earmarking the monks' property for old-age pensions, suffer the whole sum to be absorbed by attorneys or squandered by the liquidators, as in France, upon downright debauchery." The Saturday Review, it may be remarked in passing, is not a Catholic paper.

Census to Cost $15,000,000

The census of 1910, the thirteenth since the organization of the Government, will cost between $14,000,000 and $15,000,000. Congress has already appropriated $12,000,000 for the work. At the Census Bureau it is believed that a deficit of about $3,000,000 will have to be provided for. Of the 70,000 enumerators about 65,000 have been paid off as fast as vouchers are received. For work done by 57,530 enumerators $3,706,630 has been paid.

Depopulation of Vermont

It has been unofficially announced that the forthcoming census figures will disclose a loss of population in Vermont between 1900 and 1910. This has called attention to the stagnation of population in rural New England, particularly in Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont. The same condition is to be found in the upland villages of Massachusetts and Connecticut as well as in the rural counties of New York. The figures for Vermont in the censuses of the last half century have borne a marked resemblance to those of a majority of French departments. Wherever there has been a gain it is almost entirely due to immigration. Native population has almost stood still. The decline centers in the sections of the State which are removed from any considerable industrial activity and are agricultural in character. This decline in rural population is common enough among European nations. It is most conspicuous in France but is to be found also in Prussia, England and Scotland. It is sufficiently unusual however in this country to attract widespread attention. It is thought that Vermont will be the only State to show an actual decline since the last census.

Japan and Russia Friendly

A striking instance of the reconciliation which has been effected between Russia and Japan, recently at war, was given in the reception tendered a number of Russian students from Vladivostok and Harbin during their visit to Japan. Throughout the visit the Japanese did their utmost to wipe out all disagreeable memories. The Russians were received under arches of flowers the program of their reception was organized by General Nogi by the Mikado's special command and that redoubtable warrior was ordered to support on the impression which the visit made on the Russians. Count Okuma invited them to a tea party at which he addressed them. He urged that Russia colonize Siberia more rapidly in order to help bind Japan to the West. "Only by the merging of the culture of the East with the culture of the West can world peace be achieved," was one of his notable statements.

Our Fast Destroyers

Several of the latest torpedo boat destroyers added to the American fleet have exceeded the maximum speed of 34.5 knots and the Flusser with 33.7. The required maximum speed of these destroyers was 28 knots. The Pauling is the latest boat of this class to be tried. Its fastest mile as unofficially reported was 33.94 knots an hour although its contract speed was placed at 22 knots. Within a short time twenty modern destroyers will be added to the fleet which is in sore need of their services. The American flotilla does not at all compare in numbers or modernity with the British or the German. Naval experts are urging that the flotilla be rapidly increased until there is a proper proportion of destroyers to battleships and cruisers.

Correspondence

We Give It Up

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir:—I wonder if you can throw any light on the meaning or purpose of the series of articles appearing in the Examiner signed "by C. A. K." I have read them through very conscientiously but aside from discovering that they are concerned with somebody called "the Von" I don't seem to fathom what they are all about. Is it some form of advertising? or a puzzle? or does it belong to the Henry James school of writing? At the risk of confessing my mental poverty I take the liberty of asking if you have any idea what C. A. K. is writing about.

San Francisco, August 29.

Very sincerely,

—Bradley Foxstone.

Friendship That Hurt

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir:—I have been looking in vain for some comment in your paper on the significant circumstance that here in this city where the Bulletin is almost exclusively sold Hiram Johnson was beaten by Charles F. Curry. You have had a lot to say about Johnson's poor showing in San Francisco, and you have explained that it was because he is better known here than elsewhere. I am of the opinion that it was due mostly to the support of the Bulletin. I voted for Mr. Johnson. I did so because I believe in him. But I must admit that my faith in him wavered at times when I considered that he was backed and guaranteed by the most unscrupulous paper in the whole United States. And now while I am glad that he was nominated I am especially pleased that he was nearly four thousand votes behind the man that came first to the city, convinced as I am that the circumstance is conclusive of popular resentment inspired by the Bulletin's support.

San Francisco, August 29.

Yours truly,

—Cornelius Burke.

The Accomplices of a Blackmailer

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir:—You have frequently pointed out instances of the depravity, licentiousness and general moral obliquity and obtuseness of the palladiums of our liberties, our manners and of everything that we hold dear. I will suggest by way of further illustration of your topic the amiable acquiescence of the daily press in the purposes of brazen women who seek to blackmail men. For a concrete example take the case of Mrs. William Robert French who is trying to force F. Augustus Heinze to pay her a large sum of money. She claims to have been cruelly jilted by Heinze. This may be so. But certainly we have seen enough of the woman, by reason of the exposure she has made of herself, to be sure that Heinze would be very unfortunate had he married her. What this woman is trying to do is obviously nothing more nor less than to consummate a transaction properly to be described as blackmail. She is trying to extort money by threats. To intimidate her prospective victim she produces his letters, and these the newspaper have seen fit to publish. Thus the newspapers many of which would be outraged if charged with blackmail, have made themselves accomplices of a blackmailer. Worse than that: they have made their readers apply their ears to a keyhole to overhear the sentiments of a coarse grained, vulgar millionaire which he gave utterance to in what he believed to be absolute privacy. To read such letters is to have the instincts of a peeping Tom of a contemptible eavesdropper. I confess that I read two of them. But I felt ashamed of myself, though I read them not out of vulgar curiosity but to see to what depths of depravity the newspapers had again sunk. This sort of thing is utterly demoralizing. It is really enough to turn one's stomach to read in papers that practice this sort of journalism, homilies on morality and protestations against the brutality of prize-fight and the evil effects of moving pictures.

Snake Dance of the Moquis

By Le Roy Armstrong

The religious rites of the Moquis, which began on August 20th with the antelope dance, reached their height on the 21st in the snake dance. The ceremonies, which are really an invocation to the Deity for the blessing of rain, are practiced once in two years by the Arizona Indians. Weeks before, preparations for the hastily rites began in the catching of the rattlesnakes and the fitting of the participants by fasting. The catching of the snakes is intrusted to a division of the tribe called the snake gens or clan. The reptiles are carried to the upper table-land or mesa, and confined in an under-ground house or estufa, where they are guarded by old men who are made proof against the poison of the rattlesnakes as far as possible by drugs. These preparations having been made, the ceremonies are opened by the antelope dance, which is performed by the leading order of the tribe. This was celebrated the day previous to the full moon of August, and then comes the snake dance. The village where the ceremony took place was freshly swept and garnished for the great occasion. The day broke without a haze and the festivities began with a race. At an early hour the community is in motion. Fifteen young men strip and walk far out in the valley before dawn. They gather at a group of rocks five miles away, and all the people of the three pueblos are watching from the north end of the mesa. The chief stands at the head of the lines. He carries a hollow gourd, in which he has placed a quantity of water from each pool he passed to the east. It grows warm and hot. He lifts the gourd and swings it to the east, to the west, to the south, and to the north. The flame of Phoebus glorifies the sky. The first arrow of sunshine strikes the hill of the west and he lifts the gourd to the zenith, then dashes it to the ground. With a shout the runners are away, and answering shouts from their homes tell of the audience on the mesa. Five minutes and the creeping dots have become distinct figures. There is a second, a third, and then the field glass shows the other runners bunched. Ten minutes and they are plainly seen, but are running single file. Fifteen, and the naked eye can tell the winner. He is a snake, tall, lithe, and sinewy. He is running easily, and a group of girls has gathered where the path leaves the valley and breaks over the rocks toward the mesa. As the leader leaps to the crest, they shout to cheer him. Hundreds of voices from the mesas call out encouragement. One after another they dart over the rocks, up the steep pathway. An antelope is crowding fast for honors. He runs abreast and gathers strength, and leaps to the lead in a gorge so narrow no one can pass him. The watchers yell and call his name, repeating it exultantly. Twenty minutes from the start and the antelope springs up the rugged path to the level mesa and darts away to his home. One by one the rest follow him. They have run a mile in each four minutes, climbing a cliff seven hundred and fifty feet high, and they are full of strength and vigor. They are panting, but unbroken. Between the winner and the last man are only six minutes. The last one is greeted with derision. After that the day is quiet. In the snake estufa, where rattlesnakes have been caged, preparations for the final ceremony are still going on. Men naked but for one trifling garment are gathering emblems and running hither and thither. Women are dressing their hair, while the children are playing or eating or sleeping in the cool dark rooms. Cooking was done yesterday; the ovens are cold today.

Crowds are gathered upon the walls or line the narrow margin of the bluffs. Scores of citizens have purchased seats that command a view of the sacred rock. The rattlesnakes have been removed from their estufa to that beneath the cottonwood boughs. It is 4 o'clock in the afternoon. There is a hush of expectancy. A tall chief walks into the open space by the sacred rock and delivers an announcement in the Moqui tongue. A moment later the rattles of the antelope gens or clans are heard; they are coming through the covered gallery. They walk slowly with measured step, shaking the ground. The little children of yesterday are still with them. There is a roar in the crowd. The antelopes circle about the little plaza time after time. They are stained a dirty fawn-color from head to toe, and the leader wears a crown of cottonwood leaves. Each follower has armlets and anklets of the same material. Their faces are blackened below the mouth. Time and again they complete their circle, and on each return a tall chief swings a sling about his head. The noise is a deafening roar. They take up their places on either side of the cottonwood-covered grotto in which the snakes are concealed. In a moment the wilder, fiercer rattle of the snake clan is heard and the forty members come forward in single file but with a savage, swift progress, the tortoise-shell rattle smiting the ear with a dissonant sound. Each one carries emblems in his right hand, and in the left one the eagle feather wand. On the left wrist is slung a little bag of sacred meal. As they pass the block in front of the grotto of snakes, each drops a pinch of meal and stamps on the block. If he breaks it with his foot, untold blessings will be showered upon him and his. The antelopes are singing and the snake gens hastens up in front of them. The antelope leader walks down to the grotto and sprinkles it with holy water. The snake gens suddenly breaks up in groups of three. Two clasp arms about each other and march, stooping, about the plaza; the third walks behind. They are keeping time to the chanting and rattling of the antelopes. The leading trio stops in front of the grotto. The foremost plunges in his hand and withdraws a monster rattlesnake. On the roofs, in the crowds, everywhere is a shout of horror, of warning, of encouragement. The left man of the couple lifts the snake and seizes it with his teeth four inches from the head. It writhes and hisses and strikes this way and that. His attendant busily pulls its head away from the face of the bearer and strikes it with the feathers. A line of women has been formed across the west end of the plaza, and, as the marchers pass, each woman tosses in the face of the snake bearer and upon the head of the snake a little handful of meal. Each man of the snake clan has painted himself an oily black. He does not attempt to touch the snake, but carries his hands bent forward. Thus trio after trio pass in their circuit about the rock. One man has two small snakes, another carries three smaller ones. One man drops his snake when the circuit is half completed. He passes on with his attendant. The attendant following picks up the snake with a swift sweep of the hand, and the three go forward. Behind them comes another and another trio. Nearly every bearer completes the circuit before he drops the snake, but when he reaches the grotto he loosens his hold and the snakes fall sprawling. He struggles through the crush at the grotto entrance, captures another snake, and comes forward again with his attendant and follower. The scene grows wilder. The chanting and rattling of the antelope gens grow louder and fiercer. The grotto is in confusion; rattlesnakes are running everywhere. The attendants are stooping, crawling this way and that, sweeping the serpents and following the leading couple. Their hands are full of the squirming, hissing rattlers. At length the last snake has been lifted from the grotto and carried away. The last one has been dropped and has been again recaptured by the followers. Then in a chorus of yells and shouts the chief of the tribe springs forward and describes a circle on the flat stone before the sacred rock. Within this circle the followers toss all the snakes. They may be stupid and rendered timid, but they are so much alive that they writhe and run. The climax of confusion has been reached. A score of young men dart forward and snatch whole handfuls of snakes from that heaped mass. They sweep up a dozen at a time; they run to the edge of the mesa and rush down the steep path to the plains. They take the reptiles to the four points of the compass and here, in the falling shades of night, they liberate them. With the liberated serpents goes a prayer in every direction to the rain-god to send abundance of showers. The crowds betake from the mesa and hurry away. Horsemen, footmen, drivers of teams, fill the evening with the bustle of departure. The snake dance is done. The men of the snake gens drink of a fluid prepared by the medicine men, and prepare for a great feast that shall last all night. More than a thousand miles stretch from Pike's Peak to California, and the sun has burned the country brown nine months of the year. The water-courses are foot-paths for the wildcat and the panther. Yucca palms, sage brush, and Spanish bayonet comprise the vegetation; rocks and arid plains complete the landscape. Millions of acres would not support a thousand of population. Here and there a little garden is planted by the Moquis, and it lies there blazing under a sun as hot as Asia. Praying for rain, the stunted corn feels feebly for the moisture hidden far below. The peaches drink the dew and swing through sultry days of draught. The melons ripen before the vines are grown. Here on the lofty mesa the women sit at their threshold and rest from bearing great jars of water from the springs seven hundred feet below. The people have been taught that the Deity takes the form of a hissing snake and lies in the sky with his forked tail. He smites the cloud and the sea. His brilliant form is seen in the swift lightning. They hear the evidence of his power in the crashing thunder; they reap his blessing in the falling rain. They have been taught that he dwells at times in the solid rocks, and they believe he rends them now and then, that refreshing springs may gush forth for the thirsty people. So they worship him, praying, with symbols that are never cruel or inhuman, that he may send the rain on their fields from the arching sky; that he may rend the rocks and cause pure water to flow in glorious, gushing streams. Not a step in their ceremony but is a syllable in the prayer; not an emblem but is hal-lowed with a soul's sincere desire. This way they have worshipped for a thousand years.

The Mother

By Enrico Corradini (From the Italian)

"Antonio! Francesco! Giovanni!" cried the blind woman, startled from her sleep. She raised herself and rested her elbows on the bed while her eyes widened vainly in the darkness.

The tempest shook the hut.

"Antonio! Francesco! Giovanni!" repeated Marina still more loudly, trying to drown the howling of the wind as it tore round the hut, and the noise of rain beating upon the tiles.

"Antonio! Francesco! Giovanni!" she repeated again, more overcome by terror the more she cried.

Since she had lost her sight, hardly a month before, she lived in continual trepidation. And now she fancied her sons had gone out into the night and the hurricane, and that they had left her alone. She felt that they had left the door of the house open, and that it was banging. She felt half-frozen by the wind, exposed to the raging storm.

"Antonio! Francesco! Giovanni!" she called again loudly, as if she wanted her voice to be heard outside the house at a distance.

Then, receiving no answer, she sprang out of bed, meaning to go and shut the banging door. But suddenly she remembered she was blind, and the terror of her blindness overcame all her other fears.

She got into bed again, and supporting herself once more on her elbows, with chattering teeth she implored the protection of the Madonna.

The next morning, when her sons told her what had happened in the night, she could not check a scream, so terribly was she struck by the certainty that her presntiment was verified. Her sons turned to her in surprise, but she had not enough courage to question them as to whether they had gone out during the night, and what for. Had she not detected a tremble in their exclamations of surprise?

Later on, one of them told her that he had gone out last night to secure the boat against the flood. But although it was quite a natural thing, she did not believe it, and uttered no word. Had he not a motive for telling her this very natural thing?

And then the sons told her that the murder committed that night must have been a vendetta, because the police had discovered no traces of theft. Did not their voices tremble again, and had they not repeated too insistently that it was not a case of theft?

During the day the neighboring women, too, confirmed her belief. There was much discussion in the country round as to who could bear any ill-will to that holy priest unless it were thieves. Popular imagination ran riot with superstitious suppositions, trying to find some connection between the night assassination and the hurricane which had uprooted trees, overflowed the Arno, and broken in roofs. Marina, too, found a connection, but only between the occasion and the deed. And every time an outsider came in, she was afraid he came to make a discovery. There was something to discover in her house. Fear had penetrated it, and she felt that her sons must be trembling in a corner.

In short, from the very first moment the two facts had been strangely connected in the blind old mother's mind: her sons must have gone out in the night during the storm, and they must have committed the murder.

But these young men, were they not good lads? And who could bring anything against them? Had they not always shown the fear of God and great respect for the holy priest, and proved themselves incapable of hurting a hair of anyone's head? Was it not certain that it was not a question of robbery? Was it not natural that in any case only great distress would have induced the committing of a murder?

Yes, yes! Marina felt obliged to admit all that. Yet still, from the first moment, for some inexplicable reason, there had been impressed upon her mind the spectacle of the holy priest stretched on the steps of the altar, with his head battered in, and her sons rushing through the tempest with blood-stained hands. The blind woman's whole life was reduced to seeing this spectacle continually before her maternal conscience.

And things went on in that way.

The Dell' Assunta family passed the rest of that winter in even more squalid misery than before, and had often no bread to eat. The continual rains and frequent flooding of the Arno had put a stop to all work. Neither Antonio, who was a boatman, nor Francesco, a brick-layer, nor Giovanni, who worked on the farms, had work. Often the morsel of bread that sufficed to save them from starvation was the fruit of Marina's hands.

Sometimes, too, they had to do a thing they had never done before, and of which they were greatly ashamed: they had to appeal to the charity of certain kind gentlefolk who had had Giovanni in their service when he was a boy, and who were still attached to him because he was a good lad.

The latter, who was the youngest of the Dell' Assunta brothers, the most energetic and the bravest in times of distress, thought it was time when the fine weather returned to bestir himself in some way; and as many workmen of his village and the neighboring places left their homes at that time, he went with the rest.

The next year, having found enough employment elsewhere to support himself, and even to put by a few savings, he returned to fetch Francesco, the second brother, to work with him.

The two were away about three years. As they were excellent workmen and economical youths, they succeeded in saving a little hoard, and then returned to their native place.

From that time it seemed that the same providence was resolved to chase the phantom of blood away from Marina's soul, because the blessings of heaven began to descend upon the Dell' Assuntas' roof.

With Francesco to help him, Giovanni, who was always the most active and intelligent of her three children, started one of those shops to be seen in small country places, where articles of all sorts are sold, from bread to sewing-cotton. Business flourished, for Giovanni attracted people by his handsome, frank face and his joviality; and moreover the little rise in the family fortunes of these brothers, who were so liked by all in that district, was displeasing to no one. On the contrary, everyone tried to augment it in order to have the very natural satisfaction of believing it to be partly his own work.

So it befell that after a few months nearly all the country-side dealt at Giovanni Dell' Assunta's shop; and from morn till eve the latter was always behind the counter, or at the kneading-bowl or the oven; serving the customers gaily, with his pleasant banter and foolish, merry conceits; mixing wines, making bread, putting it into the oven and drawing it out again. Every day the long boards laden with warm, smoking bread wafted a good odor through the shop, and Giovanni felt inclined to laugh and sing as he thought of their former days of distress.

The good odor reached Marina, too, as she sat in a corner of the shop: but it seemed to her too strong and sharp, and she felt her sightless head in one flaming whirl where the cancer of suspicion gnawed remorselessly. But then, even after that night there had been long periods of distress in her house. Then the police, who had turned topsy-turvy the whole country round, and had burrowed in every corner, obstinately continuing the fruitless search, had not even paused before her house.

"It is all right," she had to reply to her own fears, "It is all right." But little by little, as she felt prosperity increasing around her, she seemed like one who feels the water mounting upwards to his throat and can neither move nor cry out.

And the prosperity of the Dell' Assuntas did increase. After two or three years of shop-keeping, they had means enough to augment the trade by taking in the eldest brother, Antonio, who till then had continued to work as boatman. Then Francesco, who was a less wideawake youth than Giovanni, and even rather taciturn, but sound and straight of purpose, invested in a donkey and went about the country round, selling wool, cotton, loaves of bread, and sundry other things; thus earning his living very well. Though lacking Giovanni's joviality, he gained people's liking because he was gentle, reserved, and carried on his trade, and led his little ass about, with a certain amount of gravity.

Antonio took his place with Giovanni. But the latter, now always between the same four walls, began to feel the need of air for his huge lungs, and besides, the eldest brother, who was so docile, strong-limbed and laborious, was well adapted to be the beast of burden in the shop, while Giovanni might make experiments elsewhere. His idea was to go in for wholesale trade in wine, oil, grain and such-like things. He had some savings, plenty of credit and so much intelligence that it was certain he would make a good thing of it.

During these years when, day by day and son by son, the Dell' Assunta family amassed their fortune, it was a real pleasure to see them. There were three brothers who carried on their business in peace and concord, tranquilly yet indefatigably, without troubling anyone and without concerning themselves about aught else; and a mother—a little mother—blind it is true, but not very unhappy for all that; for she seemed to be the silent, self-contained, vigilant spirit which symbolized the love and good fortune of her children.

The village, which was so resigned in its inertia and beneath the misery of centuries, watched the three industrious and prosperous brothers with pleased surprise, just as those out of work stand and watch the masons and workmen raising the walls of a new house hour by hour and brick by brick.

The Dell' Assuntas' shop was in the center of the hamlet, opposite the road leading to the church, and every morning it was a great attraction for street-boys—and grown-ups too—when Francesco, taciturn, thoughtful and grave, harnessed his donkey and loaded his cart with wool, cotton, linen and loaves of bread, and when Giovanni, gay and sprightly, loaded his large cart with casks or sacks to go and fetch oil or wine or corn, or to carry some here and there. And Antonio, the family beast of burden, helped Francesco and Giovanni, and then busied himself in the shop while Marina sat at the back of the shop in the dark, sharpening her ears whenever anyone came in, exchanging a few words with the country women, and counting the clink of coins on the marble counter. And in the evening when

Look Tin Eli is Hot

So strong is the passion for illustrations in some newspaper offices that when a photograph is wanted and not to be had, it becomes the imperative duty of somebody to supply a makeshift. This was probably the situation in the Examiner office when a call was made for a photograph of Hing Lee, the heathen who is said to have collected money from Chinatown gamblers with which to pay for police protection. As the members of our Chinese colony are not liberal patrons of the photographer's art it is somewhat more difficult to get the counterfeit presentment of one of them in an emergency than to get the picture of one of our exclusive society maidens. And the probability is that the reporters who were sent out to get a picture of Hing Lee gave up their quest in despair. But as all Chinamen look alike to the average editor as well as to the average Caucasian there was not the slightest scruple in this instance against filling the emergency want. In the Examiner's gallery of stock cuts is one of Look Tin Eli, and it was promptly pressed into service, and for this occasion labeled Hing Lee. Now unfortunately Look Tin Eli is no obscure individual. On the contrary he is one of the most prominent men in Chinatown. Indeed he is one of our foremost citizens. Born in Mendocino County, he is proud that he is a native son. President of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce, manager of the Canton Bank, one of the owners of the Sing Chong Bazaar (which spends a little money for advertising), and permanent chairman of all Chinatown reception committees, Look Tin Eli justly regards himself as a man of affairs, deserving of respect and entitled to decent treatment in the press. When he saw his picture in the Examiner, and found that he was published to the world as the low down accomplice of grafters and confidential agent of gamblers he exploded with indignation. Some of his friends have been advising him to sue for libel.

Harkening for a Call

From Oakland comes the vagrant rumor that the most polished and popular of the Protestant clergyman across the bay has his ear to the ground in expectation of a call from Boston. A year or so ago Dr. Brown was almost tempted to bid farewell to his beloved flock of the First Congregational Church. He received a fine and flattering offer from a Harvard church, and it was all that he could do to persuade himself to turn it down. But his sentimental loyalty to the First Congregational prevailed over ambition and even over sordid considerations of the most powerful nature, and one evening he took his whole congregation into his confidence, and in the most dramatic fashion he permitted them to know what tremendous sacrifice he was making for them. It was a touching story, so touching that strong men were visibly moved and susceptible women wept into wholly inadequate handkerchiefs. The trustees have since shown their appreciation of Dr. Brown's devotion to the church by giving him long vacations and an automobile. Nevertheless, I am told, Dr. Brown is no longer in a mood to overcome temptation of the kind that once he put behind him. Indeed it is hinted to me that he is casting longing eyes in the direction of New England, and would welcome a renewal of negotiations. It is explained by admirers of his that Oakland is not big enough for Dr. Brown; that notwithstanding its growth, its progressiveness, etc., it is not wholly free from some of the characteristics of the proverbial village. I am told, in short, that although Dr. Brown is still strong in the affections of the trustees and the deacons, he is not as comfortable in Oakland as formerly. But I hope that the misgivings of those members of his flock who believe they are in imminent danger of being deprived of his inspiring presence and the edification that he so cheerfully dispenses are wholly unfounded.

An Election Wizard

Matt Larkin, the local gambler, is getting the reputation of a wizard in picking election winners. During the last few campaigns in this city Larkin has backed the winners heavily and has cleaned up thousands of dollars. He won several thousands on Hiram Johnson, just as he won on McCarthy and Taylor. If my memory serves me he also picked Schmitz to win that third hard-fought campaign of the labor man against the fusion candidate. Larkin has unusually good means of obtaining the "low-down" on elections; he totally disregards the claims of campaign managers and gives ear to those who know conditions in pivotal districts and sections. If I were running for office and Larkin bet on me I would feel much more confident than if I had to depend on the assurances of my campaign manager. Larkin, by the way, was one of those who had no confidence in the hope of the white race. He backed Jack Johnson heavily.

Those Fight Pictures

There is a curious story just now gaining a limited circulation and it concerns the exhibition of the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures in San Francisco. The story may be true or it may be false. In this respect it has a family likeness to the story of graft that recently came out of Chinatown to upset the tranquillity of the administration. As the story runs it is not a question of ethics that is deterring the owners of the fight pictures from exhibiting them in this city; it is a question of terms. It will be remembered that when the showing of the pictures was prohibited the reasons given had to do with morality. It was feared that the pictures would have a demoralizing effect upon the spectators. But it is being whispered now that this moral question would be waived for a certain consideration. I have even heard the consideration quoted at sixty per cent of the proceeds. That seems a preposterous demand, but then the whole story may be preposterous. I am only repeating what I have heard. It may be deemed worthy of investigation like the story of graft in Chinatown. Such stories work great injustice to public officials when they are circulated as rumors through the subterranean channels of city life. They should be dragged into the light where their falsity may be apparent.

The Plans of the Promoters

As I have heard the remarkable tale the men who are promoting the prizefight picture exhibition balked at the stiff terms which were made for them. Having already lost thousands in consequence of the agitation against the fight pictures all over the country they hesitate to make a bad bargain. And so, I am told, they are going right ahead to present the fight pictures in San Francisco without coming to terms with anybody. They have taken legal advice in the matter and have come to the conclusion that there is no law to prevent them from showing the pictures. If any attempt is made to prevent the exhibitions their plan is to obtain an injunction and fight the matter out in the courts. They are quite optimistic about the outcome and feel, no doubt, that where so much is at stake no effort should be spared to insure victory—no effort, that is, this side of the heavy terms which rumor says have been offered to them. The pictures will be a great drawing-card. The town is hungry for the fight game, as anybody may learn who listens to the sports complaining about the dearth of pugilistic news in the daily papers. If they cannot have real fights they will flock to see the counterfeit presentment of a fight on the films. And the films are very good films. Already they have been shown twice in this city, once at the Press Club and once at the Indoor Yacht Club. When they are put on public exhibition the controversy about Jeffries' condition is bound to revive.

Was Jeffries Doped?

With the revival of that controversy are likely to come some sensational developments. Jeffries' amazing physical condition is much more apparent in the films that it was to the thousands of spectators in the big arena at Reno. For that condition the history of the prize ring has absolutely no precedent. That is why it is so hard to reach a satisfactory solution of the puzzle. From what I have heard I am inclined to think that more sports believe in the dope theory than in the nervous prostration theory advanced by Muldoon. Jeffries is firmly of the opinion that somebody doped him and so is Mrs. Jeffries. They point to his physical condition in proof of their assertion. It was fully two weeks after the fight before Jeffries got back to the prime condition he was in at Rowardennan. There are a number of suspicious circumstances that seem to add weight to the dope theory and it is interesting to hear them detailed by the men who know. I have even heard the names of two men who are suspected of having had a hand in the administration of the dope. I was astounded when they were given to me and I am not prepared to say that I believe them guilty. But that is neither here nor there. Would it not be a good notion, when the fight pictures are exhibited, to have a committee of medical specialists study the films for the purpose of giving expert opinion in this matter? It seems to me that doctors could tell from the manner in which Jeffries acted whether he was the master of himself. The controversy has interesting scientific possibilities

The Purchase of Constituents

The Hon. William R. Hearst is once more pointing the finger of scorn at the Hon. Joe Sibley. It appears that Joe is not advanced beyond the virtue of his time. He has been purchasing votes on the hoof for the purpose of getting back to Congress. He admits that he spent $42,500 in his campaign. Naturally Mr. Hearst, though a pretty good spender himself when running for a job, is shocked beyond expression in anything but short and snappy sentences. It is to be hoped that after he gets through with Sibley he will turn what he calls his withering light on the second district in which Mr. William Kent recently received a nomination. It would be interesting to learn how nearly Mr. Kent's figures approximate those of Mr. Sibley. I hear that some of the voters of the second district never saw so much money in all their lives as they saw during the primary campaign. But of course I do not mean to intimate that they were debauched; nor will I assert that the stubs in Mr. Kent's checkbook will show that he was the source of the pactolian stream that almost submerged Sacramento. It is not at all unlikely that Mr. Kent's campaign was financed by some wealthy patriots who were animated by concern for the "greater good," and who realized that the fate of the nation depended on the defeat of that malign representative of the plunderbund, the Hon. Dunk McKinlay. I do not at all agree with Macaulay who tells us that to buy the votes of constituents is as bad as to buy the votes of representatives and that it is as immoral to bribe a freeman as to bribe a member. I am heartily in sympathy with all those sacrosanct reformers who justify any and every expedient deemed essential to their success; for I wish to see them hasten the day when as in England a few centuries ago "patriot" was the popular byword of derision and a candidate could make no more telling declaration on the hustings than that he had never held himself out as a patriot. I can see history getting ready to repeat itself.

Dick—I know a girl who accepts rings from men she doesn't know.

Clara—I don't believe it. How could she?

Was Burr Van Buren's Father?

For more than a century there has been a tradition that Martin Van Buren, the eighth president of the United States, was the illegitimate son of Aaron Burr. I do not think that this story ever appeared in print until Lyndon Orr mentioned it in the last issue of Munsey's. But Gertrude Atherton made a reference to it in her novel, "Ancestors," and the reference was understood by a very few. The reference may be found on page 108 of "Ancestors" and runs as follows: "The best we can do is to descend irrelevantly from Washington, Hamilton, or Jefferson," said Isabel. "Only we have not yet reached the stage where we dare to acknowledge it on our coat-of-arms. The illusion of the American youth must be preserved. Even the fact that one of our presidents was a son of Aaron Burr is still to be read only in the great volume of unwritten history. My father was a sort of walking edition of that work." As far as I have been able to discover there are no known historical documents to attest the bend sinister in the Van Buren coat-of-arms and there is no book extant wherein the left-handed alliance between the Van Burens and the Burrs is set forth. Until Mrs. Atherton published "Ancestors" there seems to have been no hint in printed form of this scandal in early American history. But there did exist a tradition, preserved from generation to generation, of an illicit romance which made Aaron Burr the father of a future president. The story is not credited by Lyndon Orr. This is the way in which he treats it in his Munsey article: "There is another curious story, which makes Martin Van Buren, eighth President of the United States, to have been the illegitimate son of Aaron Burr. There is no earthly reason for believing this, except that Burr sometimes stopped overnight at the tavern in Kinderhook which was kept by Van Buren's putative father, and that Van Buren in later life showed an astuteness equal to that of Aaron Burr himself, so that he was called by his opponents 'the fox of Kinderhook.' But as Van Buren was born in December of the same year (1782) in which Burr was married to Theodosia Prevost, the story is utterly improbable, when we remember, as we must, the ardent affection which Burr showed his wife, not only before their marriage but afterward until her death."

A Circumstantial Tradition

This, of course, is not to be regarded seriously. Burr was a confirmed amorist and there is nothing in his career to show that his first marriage put a stop to his intrigues any more than his second marriage did. Burr was seventy-eight when he married Madame Jumel and she found good cause to be jealous of him. The story which makes Burr the father of Van Buren is very much like that which makes Shakespeare the father of Davenant, only it is told with much greater circumstantiality. His liaison with Mrs. Van Buren is said to have taken place while he was studying law in Albany and was wont to spend a good deal of time at the Kinderhook inn kept by the Van Burens. Burr was admitted to practice in Albany in April, 1782, and was married in the following July. Martin Van Buren was born in December of the same year. There is no particular reason for believing that Burr would not carry on an intrigue while courting his future wife. In such matters scrupulosity never entered into his conduct. All through his life he bore the name of a rake and rather gloried in it than otherwise.

The Story as Mrs. Atherton Tells It

I have heard the story from Mrs. Atherton, who tells it on the authority of a prominent man whose name she is not willing to divulge. "I was in Washington several years ago—it was the winter before I wrote 'Senator North,'" says Mrs. Atherton. "I met a great many senators and other public men and had long talks with them about politics and other things. They told me many interesting stories and this one about Aaron Burr and Martin Van Buren was one that made a deep impression. The elder Van Buren was a Dutchman who had a farm on the Hudson river. He was an ordinary farmer with half a dozen sons, big and slow-witted like their father, and a very beautiful buxom wife. Having nothing better to do, Aaron Burr spent his time in making himself fascinating to Van Buren's beautiful wife and the next child she bore was wholly unlike the others.

KEEPING IN TOUCH WITH HOME

IT IS wonderful how much satisfaction can be obtained from a talk over a Bell Telephone.

A letter carries words, but the Bell Service has been brought up to such a point of perfection that the modulations of the voice are clearly heard.

The cheery tones show that the talker is well and in good spirits. The call may come from a suburban village or a distant city, but within the limits of the carrying power of the voice the Bell Service carries the tone as well. You get a personal interview with a friend hundreds of miles away.

The others were big, blonde, hulking Dutchmen; this one was a small, dark fellow, well cut and handsome. He looked decidedly like Burr. The child grew up. When he was sent to school he was much cleverer than the others; so much so that it was spoken of. All the talk about the place was that he was Aaron Burr's child. It was remembered that Aaron Burr, during his stay at the farm house, used to take the fine looking wife out driving every day. The neighbors used to comment on this. If they did not know who the dashing young colonel was they guessed him to be a gentleman. It was so much easier to tell a gentleman in those days; and Burr was a splendid-looking one. The woman was evidently very superior to her husband. She was not only handsome, but, the story goes, very much bored with Van Buren. It was not difficult for the neighbors to put this and that together. Of course if the boy had never amounted to anything, the story would have died out; for I suppose Burr had a great many left-handed children. But when Martin Van Buren became president and was styled the first gentleman of America, people looked up his ancestry and the old story was remembered. Martin Van Buren did not have the big brain of Aaron Burr, but he was clever and charming. He was an admirable politician, having much of Burr's political acumen without that wild imagination which ruined Burr. Of course this is all talk. There is no proof of its truth. It is simply unwritten history told in Washington by big public men."

Their Remarkable Resemblance

Biographers of Burr and Van Buren have laid stress upon the remarkable resemblance they bore to each other. Both men were below the middle height and they were known familiarly as "little Burr" and "little Van." John Quincy Adams records in his diary that when he first met Van Buren he found in him "much resemblance" to Burr and later on he found that they were alike in mental qualities. In his life of Van Buren Edward M. Shepard has this to say:—"Van Buren made his (Burr's) acquaintance, and was treated with the distinguished and flattering attention which the wisest of public men often show to young men of promise. Van Buren's enemies were absurdly fond of the fancy that in this slight intercourse he had acquired the skill and grace of his manner, and the easy principles and love of intrigue which they attribute to him." Contemporary references harp continually on the likeness of the two men, although no mention seems to be made of the supposed relationship. It may be that hidden away somewhere are the documents which will translate this curious tradition into written history. Meanwhile through the kindness of Mrs. Atherton I have been able to give the detailed story in print for the first time since it gained currency more than a century ago.

"Your wife's a judge of human nature, isn't she?"

"Judge! She's a prosecuting attorney!"

The Call Makes a Blunder

I would suggest in all kindness to the editor of the Call that he exercise more care in editing the syndicate articles contributed to the Sunday edition by Marion Harland. Last Sunday this writer was represented in the Call by an article entitled "Just One Day—A Lay Sermon." In this article I find the following sentence: "I had said over to myself times without number, 'Take no thought for the morrow,' very much as an illiterate peasant wears a scapular and a pagan a charm against the evil eye." Now this is a sentence which cannot but give offense to all the subscribers to the Call who are numbered in the Catholic communion. Apparently neither Marion Harland nor the editor of the Call is aware that all devout Catholics wear the scapular. "Illiterate peasants" form a very small portion of those who are enrolled in the various confraternities of the scapular. To compare the wearer of the scapular to the pagan who has a charm against the evil eye is to exhibit crass ignorance of a beautiful Catholic devotion. If the Call does not want to lose its influence with Catholics it had better be more careful in publishing the effusions of Marion Harland.

The Fast Mr. Keesling

In recent years there has been a great shortage of mayoralty timber in these parts. Just before each municipal campaign the local Warwicks spent days and nights in quest of the right kind of man for the job; and if we look backward and consider the party nominees we shall instantly perceive that there must have been a woful lack of material. The difficulty has been that of finding men in whom there was a combination of ability and personal magnetism, men

Steinway Pianola Piano at Kohler & Chase

¶ The Steinway Pianola Piano is a combination of the Steinway Upright and the Pianola. The makers of the Steinway Piano looked far and wide for the best player in the world to be linked with the Steinway Piano—it is the Pianola that has been chosen. You should follow this distinguished example when you come to buy a player-piano. Be sure that you get the genuine Pianola. Do not be satisfied with any weak substitute. Please remember that Pianola Piano is a name for a certain kind of player-piano and is not a name for all player-pianos. Remember that there are 300 features in the Pianola Piano, which are not to be found in any other player-piano.

¶ In addition to the Steinway, you will find the genuine Pianola only in the Weber Pianola Piano, the Steck Pianola Piano, the Stuyvesant Pianola Piano and the Wheelock Pianola Piano. This entire line can be found only at Kohler & Chase.

capable of performing the duties of the office and winning votes, and at the same time enjoying friendly relations with both capital and labor. Now, although this difficulty still exists, when the next campaign comes round there will not be so much groping in the dark as heretofore. So far as the Republican party is concerned there is a pretty good prospect, and its name is Keesling. There are many eyes on this young man who bobbed up at the eleventh hour in the primary campaign and developed strength that amazed politicians throughout the State. Watch out for Keesling!

Carmel Appeals for Plays

From Carmel-by-the-Sea comes an appeal for plays, preferably plays dealing with California life. The Council of the Forest Theater Society, which recently produced its first drama, has decided to issue an invitation to dramatists to submit original plays suitable for production in the open air. The plays will be carefully considered by the Council. Special favor will be extended to plays dealing with the Mission period of Californian history. Of course melodramas and farces being unsuited for open air production will not be considered. Neither will plays "merely meant for entertainment." The object of the Forest Theater Society is the promotion of the higher forms of drama and it has a particularly tender regard for original works by new American dramatists. The Council announces its willingness to answer all queries from playwrights who desire further information on the subject.

The Cheerful Editor

Perhaps the best thing that can be said about the primary election is that it has passed into history and permitted the thoughts and pens of editors to turn lightly to topics which they can discuss without a depressing riot of emotions, without putting their reason at the service of their unruly passions. No man is more likely to be demoralized by a political campaign than an editor. And no man is more deserving of felicitation than the editor who can put the campaign behind him after his faction has lost. This is what my friend John Hamilton Gilmour of the Fresno Herald has done. But a short time ago he was on the verge of frothing at the mouth every time he thought of his ambitious townsman the Hon. Chester Rowell. His language was violent, his rhetoric almost inflammatory. Now he has forgotten his vexations. His spirit leaps within him as though life were beginning again. With the thermometer more than 100 in the shade of the editorial sanctum Gilmour reveals himself as the most amiable of optimists. For him the air is limpid blue, the atmosphere is steeped in joy, all the windows of his soul are clear. After a season of distressing disquiet, a sober and softening joy has returned to him. August twenty-sixth the Herald records the highest temperature of the day before as 104, the lowest 67; yet Editor Gilmour thus utters himself in his leader: "Fresno should be cheerful. Fruit prices are far better on the whole than for some years past. Prunes and apricots are soaring, peaches are being lifted by relationship." Furthermore: "Even in these midsummer days strangers are with us, seeking homes. Our hills are becoming green with orange trees; alfalfa is creeping over sections that never grew aught before save some spring vegetation that disappeared before the sun." And again: "The banks of the San Joaquin Valley are full of money," and "Our city is beautiful," so "Do not let us devote all our time to talking politics," but "let us write our friends about Fresno and tell them what a mighty good place it is to work in, to play in, to live in." Editor Gilmour can go some with his pen. When Fresno reckons its assets—prunes, alfalfa and such—it should not forget its sweet-tempered editor, the best and most enthusiastic boomer in the county. But will Fresno heed his gentle admonition and quit talking politics. I fear not.

California wines are replacing imported wines in the East. The Italian-Swiss Colony's famous TIPO (red or white) is especially popular.

With the Hon. Chester Rowell sweating over his grammar on his tripod and always pregnant with words and political issues, politics will continue to be the perennial topic in that beautiful land of sunshine and reform.

How to Belie the Thermometer

On August 26 according to the Fresno Herald of the 27th the highest temperature was again 104 and the lowest 66. And once more Editor Gilmour came up smiling, radiating gladness and diffusing exhilarating advice. "A cool drink every hour and an electric fan every minute," says the Herald sage, "make the thermometer look as pessimistic as a populist insurgent in Kansas." His advice to his readers is to divest themselves of dignity and heavy clothes and emulate the small boy with the sawed off trousers and the negligé shirt. "Get the sandals," he exclaims; "get the gauzy hose; get that light, airy, soft straw hat; get the coat you can almost see through and the underwear that is truncated in all directions and so thin it rivals cheese cloth; buy the soft thin shirts; lay away your waistcoat and suspenders; try a belt and no buttons." And solemnly this loyal Fresnoite, who was once a citizen of the world, and knows something of the sweltering heat of Kipling's "City of Dreadful Night"—solemnly he asseverates: "Fresno is never too hot in which to live comfortably. . . . If you will worry about next year's taxes and last year's interest of course you will be overwarm. But hot weather is a mighty good thing. Since dawn was in civilization, it has been a good thing. Jerusalem, Damascus, Tyre, Thebes, Athens, Rome, Carthage; seats of action, of thought, of creation, whence we draw today a large part of our knowledge, our ideals, our spiritual, political and intellectual guidance—these were hot towns; yes, indeed. So don't despise Fresno's hot weather; get acquainted with it, understand its uses, and without undue familiarity make a servant of it. Treat it for what it is: properly governed, the greatest asset you have." I submit that a man who can write like this with the mercury threatening to leap out of the tube and his body shedding streams of moisture, has something of the heaven-born qualities of a St. Francis of Assisi. I submit also that such manifestations of serenity in the midst of this tragic comedy that we call life are much more conducive to the improvement of things in general than all the rantings and ravings of the incessant job-chasers who are eternally complaining of conditions and traducing their neighbors.

"Well, Brown, have any luck on your hunting trip?"

"No, wretched; didn't kill a thing. Wish I'd gone motoring instead."

A Home for Inebriates

One of the afternoon papers recently contained an advertisement of a certain institute for the cure of inebriety. There was a picture of the institute which struck me as being familiar and the street number settled the matter. The institute is located in the old Nolan home in Golden Gate avenue! "To what base uses," one might muse with Hamlet. When the Nolan family was prosperous that home was the scene of many a brilliant entertainment. Hospitality was dispensed there with a lavish hand. The beautiful and clever Nolan girls were besieged with admirers. But many misfortunes fell upon the family. The father died in a tragic manner and Kitty, one of the most beautiful girls in San Francisco, fell a quick prey to pneumonia in Paris. There were financial reverses, too, and after the fire the old home was leased as a French restaurant. Those who had spent so many happy evenings there could not resist a sense of disappointment when they learned that the fevered gayeties of dissipation were being carried on within those walls. But the proprietor of the French restaurant re-established his rotisserie down town and the Nolan home was vacated. Then it was taken by the institute for the cure of inebriety. Truly houses have their tragedies just like human lives.

"The Sybarite" Again

Although it is some time now since the series was concluded, speculation is still rife as to the identity of "The Sybarite," who wrote for this paper the six articles, entitled "The Physician at the Supper Table." The Los Angeles Times recently quoted at considerable length from one of the papers and had this to say about the author: "It is breaking no confidence to state that 'The Sybarite' is one of the best-known citizens of Los Angeles, that the physician is a man whose name is well known throughout the Southwest, and that the club at which the suppers were held is the California Club in Los Angeles. The discussions are about evenly divided between hygiene and gastronomy—or rather of the quality of various vintages, upon which the writer of the article is a connoisseur."

Miss Maude Fay's Mistake

From one of Miss Maude Fay's closest friends in this city I learn that those who have the best interests of the beautiful California singer at heart are very sorry she made her professional debut in London this year. Miss Fay sang in His Majesty's Theater in an early opera of Richard Strauss' which did justice neither to the composer's fame nor to the vocal powers of Miss Fay. Naturally she did not make the impression which she would have made in a more congenial role. Besides His Majesty's Theater is not recognized as the home of grand opera in London. A singer who hopes to capture musical London must sing at Covent Garden. Miss Fay had no opportunity to sing at Covent Garden this year but the opportunity might have come next season. It remains to be seen whether her chance has been spoiled by her premature debut. In no branch of the theatrical profession are managers so much the creatures of custom as in opera and Miss Fay's

MISS BERTHA EUDEY

Whose engagement to John Potter Littlefield, the son of Major Littlefield of Ogden, has been announced. Her father was the late Henry Eudey of Amador County. The wedding will take place at the home of the bride's mother in Oakland on September 7 and the young people will make their home in the national capital where Mr. Littlefield has a government position.

haste to sing in London may cost her dear. If that should be the case none will be more keenly disappointed than her friends in San Francisco who are eager to see her gain the position to which they think her voice entitles her. Some of them are recalling the case of Marcia Van Dresser who is expected to be one of the world's great singers in time. Miss Van Dresser too was eager to conquer London and sang for a season at Covent Garden. She was so successful that she has been offered another contract for next season but De Reszke, her teacher, will not allow her to accept it. He says that her time has not come and that she must be patient until it does. Miss Fay, I understand, has been offered a new five-year contract in Munich and her friends think that it would be well for her to accept it. At the end of that time she should be ready for a London triumph in Covent Garden.

The Cause of Her Impatience

It seems that Miss Fay is divided between operatic and social ambition and this is another matter which is giving her friends anxiety. They fear that she was lured to London quite as much by the desire to enter society as by the hope of achieving an operatic triumph. During her stay there she was made a great deal of and accepted many invitations. It is said that she even attended a big luncheon on the afternoon of her first appearance in London. Many a stage career has been wrecked in just this way. When the social bee buzzes in art is apt to be stung. Operatic stars are bound to be entertained in a city like London where hostesses are forever looking for lions and lionesses who will consent to roar. I do not know whether Miss Fay sang at any of the functions which she attended in London. When she was in this city she very wisely refrained from lending her voice to private entertainments of any sort. For a young singer like Miss Fay to cherish the ambition of making a place for herself in London society is considered a great mistake. She is not attempting the impossible but she is striving for something which will cost more than it is worth and will seriously interfere with her work. So Miss Fay's friends argue and they are sincerely hoping that she will put the temptation behind her and stick closely to her studies.

Here Comes a Duke

A real duke, young, good-looking, pleasant mannered and unmarried, is coming to San Francisco. This is news to set many a feminine heart in palpitation. But better still, the duke wants to meet pretty American girls. I can imagine the commotion which this news will make when it is repeated over the tea cups. For where should the duke look for pretty American girls if not to San Francisco where artists like Dana Gibson and Harrison Fisher have found or hoped to find the typical America beauty? It is true that the duke has announced that he is not thinking of getting married but that will not render him exempt from the fascinations of our beautiful girls. Being only twenty-two years old he is probably more or less susceptible, so girls, prepare to receive him and who knows but that one of you may become his duchess!

Who the Duke Is

The duke in question is Franz Josef Michael Karl Maria Evariste Quirinus Ottakar of Bavaria and if you won't take him on trust, just look him up in your Almanach de Gotha. What? You haven't an Almanach de Gotha? Ridiculous! No fashionable library is complete without one. As well dispense with Burke or the Blue Book. The duke is a slim youth, a trifle under average height but with the spring of an athlete. He has himself tailored by Poole, talks English almost without an accent and wears a mustache that is no larger than a bushy eyebrow. He is a lieutenant in the Kaiser's crack regiment of Uhlans and at home is known as a crack horseman. He is also a great sportsman and has a collection of big game heads and racing yacht trophies. I am sorry to say that the duke is a little remote from the throne of constitutional Bavaria. His great uncle Prince Luitpold is the present ruler, governing in the stead of the mad king and he has a lot of direct descendants. Our coming ducal visitor is the son of the late Duke Karl Theodore who won international fame as an oculist. He used to treat the poor free of charge. But though he may never rule he is a royal highness just the same with the blood of the Wittelsbachs coursing through his veins. When the duke was crossing to New York he was quite democratic, spending his time informally in the smoking room. When he landed he told the reporters quite unaffectedly why he came. "I did not come here to get married," he said. "I came to see the country, to see the charming women of America, to shoot a little and to sail a yacht. I hope to meet many American women. They have a charm that seems irresistible to many of my countrymen." When asked if his rank would preclude his marriage with a commoner he said, "Not at all." Flutter, ye feminine hearts! The duke is sailing his yacht at Newport. When he leaves there he will come to San Francisco, though he may stop off in the Rockies to shoot a grizzly.

It Was Gay at Del Monte

From an expert observer of social activities I learn that Del Monte has never been quite so gay as during the recent golf tournament. The pace set at Santa Barbara was quite lively but it was greatly accelerated when the smart set moved northward. Having serious work to do on the links our fashionables fortified themselves thoroughly with good cheer. The principle was a correct one but in some instances, I understand, it was too enthusiastically applied. In other words the good cheer interfered with the golf and several of the best players disappointed those who had backed them to win. Not that any of the golfers refrained from playing, but that they were not in their best form. One cannot expect to outwatch the stars with mirth and put up a championship article of golf in the morning, yet that is what several attempted at Del Monte. I have been told in confidence of one player who saw so many golf balls where he should have seen only one that he complained to his caddy and would not believe that he was the victim of an optical illusion. There is no doubt that eccentricities such as these added to the zest of the sport and some of those who attended the tournament say that they never before knew that an element of unconscious humor lurked in the sober Scotch game. I presume that reference was made to the performances of those who were fatigued by the exertions of overnight sociability. When next society foregathers at Del Monte to play golf may I be there to see!

The Fascinating Miss Newhall

I heard an experienced matron make the remark a few days ago that it is many years since any belle has conquered as many hearts in so short a time as Miss Marian Newhall. There is no doubt that she is right. This young lady possesses such beauty and charm that the men find her irresistible and her progress through the season was marked by an ever lengthening chain of submissive captives. Thornwell Mullally has made this vivacious girl the honored guest at many an affair. To give an exhaustive list of the others would be a laborious task—there are so many of them; but Carl Wolff, Raymond Armsby and Clare Payne are numbered among them. Payne is one of the latest. Formerly his devotion was directed toward Miss Elizabeth Newhall but recently the sister has claimed a good deal of his attention. They are saying over the tea cups that he will be a very lucky man who captures Miss Marian Newhall.

The Hobble Explained

Out of New York's fashionable Fifth avenue comes the most original explanation of the hobble skirt which I have yet happened on. It is given by one of the well known man milliners of the metropolis but whether as a joke or in deadly earnest I am unable to say. However as the man milliner is usually a person of extreme seriousness I incline to the view that no humorous intent prompted the explanation. "It has been horribly cold and rainy in Paris for some time," says this authority, "and the ladies attending the races and outdoor fetes have suffered intensely. The hobble skirt which fits tightly about the hips and is drawn in closely at the bottom was evolved to protect them from the chilling winds and to prevent their clothes from being the sport of the breezes." To puncture this explanation it is only necessary to inquire from some fair wearer of the hobble how many undergarments she has beneath it. If the answer is truthful it will demonstrate that there is very little protection against the cold for the unfortunate victim of the hobble fashion. All those who have the courage to ask the delicate question will agree with me—if they survive the withering glance which is likely to greet their query.

Another "Spook" Romance

"Professor Napoleon" is once more charged with the responsibility of a romance. The latest engagement is that of Miss Edith Lowe of Sausalito and Hans Wollman of Hamburg. These two interesting young people were partners in the Spook dance last winter. Miss Lowe is the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lowe of Sausalito where Miss Edith was born. Her father for a number of years was associated with the late Robert Dunsmuir Sr. as confidential clerk. Jack Lowe, one of the young society beaux of Marin County, is a brother of the prospective bride. Mr. Wollman belongs to an old family which has lived for generations in the German city. Miss Lowe is a very pretty and lovable young girl and a general favorite in society across the bay. No date has been set for the wedding.

In Strenuous Newport

Owing to the strenuousness of the summer season in Newport a number of the most prominent people there have been prostrated. The round of smart functions has been so crowded that not only the women but even the men have felt the strain and in many instances have been compelled to retire. Within the past few days particularly the strain has manifested itself. Mrs. French Vanderbilt fainted at a dinner dance. At another dinner dance Mrs. William E. Carter fainted and she and her husband were so exhausted that they hurried away to the mountains to recuperate. At a luncheon Mrs. Reynolds Hitt and Mrs. Reggie Vanderbilt fainted. Mrs. Pembroke Jones is in mourning and has not taken part in all the gayeties but she was forced to withdraw from the giddy whirl just the same. And so it goes. The only woman who has stood the strain without exhibiting any appearance of fatigue is Miss Sears who can dance through the night and do all sorts of athletic stunts through the day without getting tired.

The Dunham-Bliss Marriage

Society was genuinely surprised to learn of the marriage of Miss Florence Dunham, daughter of the late Captain Dunham, and Duane L. Bliss, general manager of the Lake Tahoe Railway Company. The ceremony was performed at Tahoe last Saturday by the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop and only members of the immediate families attended. As Miss Dunham Mrs. Bliss was well known here, having been one of Oakland's most popular belles. For a time she made her home in Paris but since her return she has lived with her mother in the beautiful Dunham home in Los Gatos. Mr. Bliss is the son of Dr. Duane Bliss and a brother of Walter Bliss whose engagement to Miss Edith Pillsbury was announced some time ago. Mr. and Mrs. Bliss will make their home at Tahoe during the summer and in this city during the winter.

Another California Woman Succeeds

I learn with great pleasure that Mrs. Olive Timmons, formerly of Palo Alto, will make her debut in grand opera in Germany on October 6. Mrs. Timmons has been studying in Berlin for the past two years and has been engaged for the opera season of six months at the Stadttheater at Plausen in Saxony. Her premiere will be the role of Azucena and during the season she will sing some twenty roles, varying from lighter parts to heavy Wagnerian roles. So much has the director of the Stadttheater been impressed with Mrs. Timmons' voice that he is going to feature her as his principal singer. In Berlin Mrs. Timmons attracted much attention by the beauty of her voice. She has been working steadily and has sung in public only a few times, generally at the American Woman's Club or at the American church. Recently she sang at a musical tea given by her teacher, Mme. Schoen-Rene. One of the guests was Emily Pauer, the well known director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra who predicted for her a brilliant career. Mrs. Timmons is the wife of Joseph Timmons, a well known newspaperman who left a position in this city some time ago for the assistant city editorship of the Los Angeles Examiner. After leaving Stanford where he met his wife he edited the Palo Alto Times for a while.

The Rutherfords' Chinese Servant

No dweller below stairs in this city is quite so well known as the old Chinese servant of the Rutherfords. He has been with the family for years and will probably die in its service. He is the only Chinese servant in San Francisco who smokes fifty cent cigars, having cultivated the taste through long association with Aleck Rutherford. The Rutherfords are traveling just now and the Chinese servant has taken advantage of the opportunity to pay a visit to China. Most Chinese remain in China when they accumulate enough money to make the trip but the Rutherfords' Chinese servant likes America too well and is coming back. Before leaving the city he announced that he was going home to astonish the natives by his prosperity. When he has accomplished that very commendable object he will come back to work.

Two Artists Going East

Mrs. Rosa Hooper Plotner and her young son Hooper are leaving today for New York which will be their home for the next year. Mrs. Plotner will open an attractive studio in the metropolis and will devote her time to painting miniatures. Already she has several orders from prominent people. She has just completed a very beautiful miniature of Miss Helen Dean, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Deane, who is residing at the Fairmont. New York continues to be the mecca of our talented California girls. On today's Overland Limited Mrs. Augustine Strickland, formerly Augustine Harazthy, is leaving for her home in New York after a visit to old friends here. Mrs. Strickland has a beautiful studio where she is doing "home portraiture" with marked success. She has not been idle while here but has made beautiful pictures of Mrs. George H. Lent, Miss Alice Hagar, Mrs. W. A. Deane, Miss Helen Dean and several other equally prominent people. Others leaving on today's Overland Limited are Mr. and Mrs. George H. Wells and Mrs. Selby Hanna who are going to Chicago to visit Mr. and Mrs. Charles Huse who have recently moved into a handsome new home in the windy city.

Tennis Tournament at Del Monte

On the heels of the golf contest which has just been closed at Hotel Del Monte comes the tennis tournament. It starts September 2 and will be the twenty-third annual affair of the Pacific States Lawn Tennis Association. It is regarded by tennis "cracks" as the authoritative meeting of the year. This season more than usual interest has been aroused owing to the great success of California players in other parts of the country. McLaughlin and Bundy who were sent East by the Pacific States Association have done remarkably clever work and placed California far up in the scale of supremacy. The Association has wired these men to be in California for the Del Monte play and the public will be given a chance to see them in action next week. Miss Hazel Hotchkiss has likewise done some splendid playing and returns with championship honors from both the Northwest and the East. The Sutton sisters have been playing continuously in the South in preparation for the Del Monte events. Miss Florence Sutton will have to defend her title as present champion of the Pacific Coast against her strenuous sister May, as well as against the undefeated Miss Hotchkiss.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. Phoebe Hearst spent the week in town at her apartments at the Fairmont. Mrs. Hearst was the hostess at a series of four luncheons during the week entertaining from nine to twelve friends each time.

Lady "Bob" Hadfield has returned to the Palace after a pleasant sojourn in Santa Barbara where the smart noblewoman was greatly entertained and admired. She is accompanied by her brother, Henry W. Anderson of Richmond, Va. Sir Robert was obliged to cut his visit shorter than he expected and has returned to England. Lady "Bob," however, will remain in California a month or two longer and will be at the Palace several weeks.

Many were the merry little dinners and suppers last week at Del Monte. On Monday evening Miss Helena Irwin, Miss Elizabeth Newhall, Bert Payne and Templeton Crocker formed one of the little dinner parties in the grill room. Tuesday Willie O'Connor, to celebrate his birthday, had a dinner, his guests being Mrs. Walter Martin, Miss Lily O'Connor, Miss Jennie Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred S. Tubbs, Mr. and Mrs. F. W. McNear, Douglas Grant, Frank D. Frazier, Prescott Scott and Duane Hopkins. Mrs. Henry T. Scott was a dinner hostess in the grill Friday evening, among her guests being Mr. and Mrs. McNear, Miss Goss of England, Miss Crockett, Duane Hopkins, Templeton Crocker and Helena Irwin.

A Modest Actor

By Theodore Bonnet

It would be hard to say offhand or even after the most conscientious deliberation who is the greatest actor in America. This has been a moot question ever since the death of Edwin Booth. The late Richard Mansfield had many worshippers, but his preeminence was never universally acknowledged. Indeed in his time the sentiment was prevalent that there were three kinds of actors—good, bad and Richard Mansfield. Nowadays with stars glimmering in blinding and bewildering profusion, and taste infinite in its variety, there is no actor from George Cohan to Rohman's highest priced star who cannot somewhere find a verdict in his favor. The truth is that excellence in the histrionic art is not a matter of canon so much as a matter of taste. Moreover there are no fundamental principles by which we can judge of merit in this art. There are no laws governing the actor's craft based on the eternal verities as in painting with its principles of perspective, of drawing, of composition and of coloring. We must take the actor as we find him, and judge him by his effect on our emotions; and we are not all susceptible to the same appeal. Some people regard John Drew as the greatest of actors because he always contributes to the atmosphere of the drawing-room, so elegant is his port, so polished his manner, so natural his gestures. There are others who perceive that his effectiveness depends on characteristics peculiar to himself, and who hold that consequently he is no actor at all. Some day, perhaps in the near future, one of the many stars that are now diffusing their luminosity in theatredom, will suddenly give evidence of such a vast increase of candle power as to compel general recognition as premier orb of the whole system. Now it wouldn't surprise me a bit if James K. Hackett should be the one. For if Mr. Hackett is not our greatest actor he is at least the most enthusiastic and the most zealous, while at the same time he is perhaps the only star who is not convinced that his art is matchless. There is no limit to the potentialities of an actor who combines zeal and enthusiasm with a suspicion of the existence of raw edges. Mr. Hackett is the only actor in whom I have found this admirable combination. Called before the curtain at the Alcazar last Saturday night—the last but one of a long and most prosperous engagement—Mr. Hackett made a brief and graceful speech thanking his audience for its generous manifestation of appreciation, and expressing the hope that when he returned again he would have so perfected himself in his art as to be more deserving of approval. A modest speech was this; and astonishing as it may seem the modesty of it was not affected. James K. Hackett is that incredible person, an actor and a star who is looking forward to the attainment of the higher reaches of his art. Moreover he is one of the few contemporary stars with a nebular past. He was not created by the wizards of the syndicate overnight. He served an apprenticeship to his art in the exacting school of experience, the old-fashioned pre-syndicate school which holds for its principle and practice the utter eradication of the player's personal identity and the assumption in its stead of that of the character impersonated. In his time Mr. Hackett has played many parts, but he is still a young man, being in the early forties, and he still expects to make substantial progress in the refinement of his natural gifts, in the improvement of all the artifices and touches of cunning elaboration by which the actor counterfeits a personality removed from his own. In other words Mr. Hackett is imbued with the true spirit of the sincere artist, a spirit that has ceased to be a characteristic of the American stage notwithstanding its wealth of inspiring tradition. Perhaps if Mr. Hackett would even now identify himself with "classic repertoire" many theatre-goers would immediately accord him the pedestal of preeminence. What magic there is in the "classic repertoire"! Think of what it has done for Mr. Sothorn and Mr. Mantell! In classic roles an actor may do little more than imitate, and yet win credit for the supreme faculty of imagination. How rare is the actor who reflects new light on Hamlet! A Shakespearean role is really easier to portray than (for example) such a role as Samson. Every Shakespearean role has its traditions. Samson calls for imagination, for the inventive faculty. In this role Mr. Hackett achieved distinction at the Alcazar, and yet the character is one that requires the laying aside of many of the most attractive features of his equipment. He shows us in this character the mental struggle, the tortured mind of the man of elemental passions and unvarnished ways. With ease and certainty of technique, with fluency and flexibility of voice and manner, he vividly images forth the very depths of the man's nature. This part Mr. Hackett plays with the most exuberant vitality, but you always have a sense of his power in reserve. He never strains. He has perfect mastery of everything that he summons to his aid. Most realistic of all his craftsmanship is his play of facial expression. Over his mobile countenance sweep the emotions like drenching waves. Here certainly is an actor with soul rather than system, and with his ambition it should lift him to great heights. His repertoire is one that calls for considerable versatility. Has he the amplitude of power to compass the very highest intellectual roles? Perhaps we shall know when he returns again.

ONE OF THE POWERFUL SCENES FROM "THE BATTLE"

In which Wilton Lackaye will appear at the Savoy Theater.

Caution at the Alcazar Opening

By Edward F. O'Day

Of course we all know that the coming of a new leading man to the Alcazar is an event, so is the coming of a new leading woman. When a leading man and a leading woman make their debut together the occasion is almost epochal. But I wonder how many realize how trying such occasions are for the dramatic critic? The dramatic critic must attend the opening performance, make a swift appraisal of the new leading man and new leading woman and rush to his office to pass written judgment on their qualifications. The dramatic critic cannot hesitate, for he who hesitates loses the first edition and incurs the censure of his editor. The morning papers are never so interesting as when they contain the dramatic critics' judgment of a new leading man or a new leading woman at the Alcazar. For this reason the morning papers of last Tuesday were unusually interesting. But perhaps the interest did not flow so much from the dramatic criticism as from the psychology of the dramatic critics. There is no doubt that the dramatic critics felt the responsibility of their position. They are men of experience in their work and they have seen new leading men and new leading women come and go at the Alcazar. They remember that some have come with éclat and departed with ignominy while others have come with misgiving and stayed in triumph. They recall that they did not always "call the turn" on these comings and goings. Does it not therefore behoove them to be cautious? Indeed it does. Discretion is the better part of dramatic criticism always, but particularly so when new leading men and new leading women are under discussion. So

I note with interest that the dramatic critics have been cautious. They agree that Monday night which introduced Miss Jane Gordon and Mr. Thurston Hall to the Alcazar audience in Pinero's "His House in Order" was an eventful evening in local theaterdom. With wonderful unanimity they declare that the play is very like Pinero, not an amazing discovery. Also they give a great deal of variegated praise to Miss Gordon and Mr. Hall. Beyond that they are unanimous in nothing except caution. While the dramatic critics of the Examiner and Call declare that the debut of the new players is more important than the first production of the play, the dramatic critic of the Chronicle takes the opposite position. He says that as the evening progressed interest in the players was sunk, to thoughtful observers, in the absorbing interest excited by the play. This difference of opinion constitutes a psychological study in caution and the study becomes intensely interesting when we consider the variety of expressions which the dramatic critics have applied to the two new players. While they have very decided opinions about Pinero and his play they are not so cocksure by any means about the new players. The Chronicle critic ventures the statement that Miss Gordon possesses a natural acting instinct developed by excellent training. He finds that her emotionalism is convincing but that it does not display a great sense of shading and that it is occasionally monotonous. He grants that she has temperament. The Examiner critic does not mention temperament but he says that Miss Gordon has personality "or call it magnetism, if you like."

He finds her volatile, vivacious, rapid in speech and action. The Call critic declares that Miss Gordon has magnetism, grace and a sort of temperamental buoyancy. He grants her emotional strength. As to Mr. Hall the Chronicle critic finds him handsome, easy, natural and "intelligent enough to avoid tricks and staginess of the typical matinee idol." "He played the part in his own way." The Call critic says Mr. Hall is big and blonde, adding cautiously that "the ladies vote him handsome." "What more can mortal leading man desire?" he demands. The Examiner critic mentions that Mr. Hall is tall and blonde, but does not risk an opinion as to his being handsome. But he thinks Mr. Hall is slow, easy-going and deliberate, an interesting collocation of adjectives. Have we not here exhilarating data for the study of the psychology of the dramatic critics? Do they not display an admirable reserve? I will not go so far as to say that they have adopted Talleyrand's definition and make use of words to conceal their thoughts, for their thoughts are to be seen hiding behind their adjectives. The critics could not make up their minds about Miss Gordon and Mr. Hall on Monday night but they were careful not to say so. They conveyed their mental condition by oblique references. Being but a humble member of the critical brotherhood I shall not avail myself of the privilege. I saw Miss Gordon and Mr. Hall in "His House in Order" and deem them worthy of high praise. They measure up to the high Alcazar standard. But will they be successful as leading woman and leading man of the Alcazar stock? I'm blest if I know.

BERT KALMAR and JESSIE BROWN

Who will appear this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

EUGENIO BATTAIN

The famous tenor who will sing Faust next Monday night with the Revani Grand Opera Company at the Garrick Theater.

Stage

Rose Stahl in "The Chorus Lady"

Miss Rose Stahl returns to this city on Monday, opening an engagement of two weeks at the Columbia in her farewell appearance as Patricia O'Brien in "The Chorus Lady," a comedy by James Forbes. The personal triumph and international success of Miss Stahl in the famous Forbes play has placed her among America's premost American stars. During the several seasons that Miss Stahl has been playing Patricia O'Brien she has never missed a performance, a record unequalled by any other star in the theatrical profession. Miss Stahl will bring her entire New York and London supporting cast. Matinees will be given Wednesday and Saturday.

Lackaye in "The Battle"

The last performances of "The Lottery Man" will be given at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening and on Sunday evening. Wilton Lackaye will begin an engagement limited to one week in "The Battle," Cleveland Moffett's play that created such a stir in New York. In "The Battle" Mr. Lackaye is cast for the part of a financier of the Morgan or Rogers type. A special matinee will be given on Monday, Labor Day, in addition to the "Pop" matinee of Thursday and the regular Saturday afternoon performance. The Savoy will be dark on Sunday, September 11, and on Monday evening, September 12, Margaret Illington and a splendid supporting company will present for the first time here "Until Eternity," especially adapted for the star by Edward Elsnér.

The Bevani Oper Company at Garrick

The Bevani Grand Opera Company which during the past two months have established a splendid reputation at Idora Park will begin a short season of grand opera next Monday night at the Garrick Theater. This organization is conceded by the press to be the best that has appeared in California in the last four years. It includes besides alternate casts a large and efficient chorus and an excellent orchestra. It will be specially augmented for the coming season and among the additions will be Madame Anna Frery, a dramatic soprano who arrived from Europe last Monday. She was prima donna of the Grand Opera House, Brussels, and also principal soprano soloist with the famous Colonne Concerts in Paris. Madame Frery will make her American debut next Monday night as Marguerite in Faust, a role in which she has achieved great fame abroad. The repertoire for next week will be as follows: Monday night, "Faust" with Madame Frery, Margaret Jarman, Lucy Van der Mark, Eugenio Battain, Ettore Campana, Joseph Florian and Alexander Bevani. Tuesday night, "Rigoletto" will be given with Regina Vicarino, Edmee de Dreux, Estelle Burgess, Umberto Sacchetti, Achille Alberti, Alexander Bevani, Joseph Guiliani and others. "Martha" will be sung Wednesday night with Guiditta Francini, Edmee de Dreux, Umberto Sacchetti, Ettore Campana and Joseph Florian. Thursday night "Faust" will be repeated with nearly the same cast. Umberto Sacchetti will sing Faust and Achille Alberti Valentine. "Rigoletto" will be sung for the second time Friday night when Eugenio Battain will have the role of the Duke and Ettore Campana that of Rigoletto.

An Old Favorite

David Belasco and Franklin Fyles collaborated in constructing "The Girl I Left Behind Me" which is to be the Alcazar's offering during Admission week, commencing with a Monday matinee. It is one of the best plays of American military life ever written and when originally produced in New York was the reigning dramatic sensation of an entire season. Thurston Hall will be seen as Lieutenant Hawksworth, Howard Hickman as Lieutenant Morton, Will R. Walling as General Kenyon, Louis Bennisson as an Indian chief, Burt Wesner as Major Burleigh, Thomas Chatterton (his first appearance) as a young physician, Charles Gunn as Private Jones, Jane Gordon as Kate Kenyon, Grace Barbour as Hawksworth's sister and Catherine Calhoun as a typical frontier girl, with the remainder of the players and many extra people rounding out the long cast. Each of the four acts calls for a picturesque setting and it is needless to say that the pictorial requirements will be fully complied with.

A Very Promising Bill

George Auger and his company will appear at the Orpheum next week in "Jack the Giant Killer," a playlet founded on the fable. Auger is a real giant and Ernest Rommel is the smallest actor and singing comedian in America. "Jack the Giant Killer" will be enjoyed by old and young. It has special scenery and lighting effects. Bert Kalmar and Jessie Brown will present a series of characteristic dances. The Jack Artois Duo are a couple of gymnasts in the guise of clowns. The Bison City Four has long been recognized as one of the best singing quartettes in vaudeville. It introduces eccentric comedy. Next week will be the last of McKay and Cantwell, Mr. and Mrs. Erwin Connelly in "Sweethearts," The Kraggs Trio and The Top O' Th' World Dancers and the original "Collie Ballet" in "Kris Kringle's Dream."

Bishop Players in "The Truth"

Izetta Jewel concludes her season at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, with the performances this Sunday afternoon and evening of "Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines," and on Monday afternoon next the Bishop players open their regular season with the first stock presentation to be given in the West of "The Truth," Clyde Fitch's play in which the new leading lady of the company, Muriel Hope, makes her initial appearances. Miss Hope has never before appeared before California audiences, Manager Bishop having brought her out direct from New York City where she is considered one of the very best of the younger leading ladies developed in the last few years. There will be special matinees of "The Truth" on Monday and Friday, in addition to the regular Saturday and Sunday matinees.

Good Music at Idora

With the performance tonight (Saturday) of Offenbach's "The Love Tales of Hoffmann" the Bevani Opera Company will close its successful engagement of seven weeks. As a compliment to the management the Bevani company will render two concerts in the theater on Sunday. The principals will sing selections from their favorite operas; while the orchestra and chorus will be heard in ensembles. Ellery's Royal Italian Band has scored a pronounced hit and will remain the chief attraction until the close of the present season. Ellery has arranged many interesting special programs for this coming week. His indoor Tuesday symphony concert, played in the afternoon, appeals to all lovers of high class music.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The recent week in Wall street has witnessed a further decline in securities from the high level of the previous week. The market movement has been the result of some inside manipulation by professionals and a few large traders, but the volume of business has been very small indicating the inactivity of leading banking interests here. The only two factors of interest during the week worthy of note were a frost scare in the corn belt that did no damage and the change of the flow of money to this center. The latter factor was the more important as it shows the turn of money to the West for crop moving and will probably run into heavy volume in the coming weeks. We expect to see a continuation of recent manipulation in stocks with the likelihood of a further rise in values, anticipating a good government crop report September 8, but after this period it is not unlikely that a material decline will be seen in September. There is no change in the copper situation and prices of copper stocks will be governed by the action of the general stock market.

Wheat—Very modest net changes were made in the wheat market the world over last week but local sentiment was optimistic as to values at the close. There are a number of elements of strength in the situation but it is plain that hope and optimism are capitalized altogether too high. A glance at the table shows that while September is only 11-2 cents higher than at this time last year, December is 101-2 and May 113-4 above last year's level. It is difficult to figure out a legitimate cause for the big difference in the deferred months. At this time last year there had been enough wheat sold to go abroad to cut the available wheat here down to about what it is now, counting the difference in the carry-over and the production of the two years. At that time the trade, from the speculator, exporter, miller and producer down to the consumer, was highly optimistic as to values, and every body was in a buying temper. This year the situation is reversed. Buyers are conservative, are working on a strictly hand to mouth basis and all attempts to stir up popular disposition toward speculative buying have been flat failures. Professional speculators have been the chief and about the only important buyers. The pressure of winter wheat on the market is growing rapidly less. Last week's primary receipts at winter wheat centers fell short of those of a year ago, except at Chicago, while the spring wheat movement has meanwhile been rapidly increasing.

Corn—Indications were plentiful in the last half of last week that old corn was being forced to market by the splendid prospect for the new. Frost predictions on Thursday forced a good advance in prices, but they failed to materialize and values reacted next day. There is probably considerably more late corn this year than last that will, in the event of frost at a normal period, be damaged to a greater or less extent. The indications, however, are for a bumper crop of corn. The last week has been excellent for the filling of the ears and this will probably be recognized by the amateur crop experts who utilize the week end to make comparisons.

Cotton—The market for the past week has been a very small affair with prices at the close of the week showing very little change from the previous week. Monthly reports issued by a leading southern newspaper, so far as published, are considered bearish on account of the improvement indicated in the eastern belt since last month. Texas is still to be heard from and it is probable that the returns from Texas will not prove so bearish. The trade at present seem to be looking for a report next Friday little if any below last month's 75.5. Sentiment is more bearish than for some time and a rather large short interest will probably be carried over unless the market breaks sufficiently in the meantime to warrant covering. The movement of new cotton is on a large scale, especially from Texas, and while it may be due to premature opening of the bolls on account of the dry weather in that state it also shows that farmers are satisfied with present prices. This movement will become quite general next month and with the present indifferent attitude of the spinner at this level it looks as if the movement from now on will be a factor to be reckoned with.

Mrs. Wiggin's Idea of London

During the recent visit of Mrs. Wiggin, the American author, in London, an interviewer called on her. With pencil poised, the interviewer asked:

"And what do you think of London, Mrs. Wiggin?"

"You remind me," answered the author cheerfully, "of the young lady who sat beside Mr. Gibbon at dinner. She turned to him after the soup:

"Do, dear Mr. Gibbon," she said, 'tell me about the decline and fall of the Roman Empire.'"

The Nervy Peddler

"Let me sell you a galvanized hat-rack," began the nervy peddler.

"Got a dozen hat-racks now," growled the grouchy suburbanite.

"How about a combination whisk-broom and tooth brush?"

"One in the garret."

"Let me show you an ostrich incubator?"

"Get away from here or I'll mop the floor up with you."

And then the agent opened his yellow satchel.

"Why, my dear sir, such strenuous exercise on a warm day is highly injurious. Let me sell you one of the greatest floor mops in seven states—"

But just then the bulldog got loose.

"I see you employ a number of old men."

"I do."

"How old are they?"

"Too old to be interested in canoeing, or mandolins, or race-horses, or girls, or tennis. That makes them fine for work."

her younger sons returned, she raised her two hands, cup-like, to the level of her poor blind eyes, to receive their gains; and her little, rough, shaking hands seemed to tremble more with cupidity every evening.

But the natural senile cupidity in Marina was like certain shrubs which thrive ill because they are near some large tree which deprives them of light and soil; it was dominated by another feeling. Since the time when a few of God's blessings began to descend upon the house, Marina exerted all her rights as mother to constrain her sons to consign their gains to her keeping. The sons, who were always extremely affectionate, especially after their past miseries, and who wished to remain all united, very willingly consented, and deposited their common gains in her hands.

Marina had wished it to be so because she had no doubt—was, in fact, certain—that their new fortune was founded on crime and cursed by God, and, therefore, it must be saved against the day of reckoning, for some obscure restitution. In this way, remorse and the family treasure were connected in the blind old woman's mind, and in accumulating it without knowing for what or for whom, she experienced all the sentiments which nature would have excited in her mind had she been amassing for herself and children; even more, for all these sentiments took the form of a religious mania. In her little dark brain a continuous calculation went on, as it does in the brains of other old misers; while at the same time a voice repeated to her from the depths of her conscience:

"Thou art laying it up for the day of justice! Thou art laying it up for the day of justice!"

The justice of God always kept an open eye upon the family hoard, and upon the calculations in her brain. And the more the hoard grew, the nearer the day of justice came, and the more Marina trembled in awaiting it.

One day she was in her usual corner of the shop, in the dark. There were two or three people of the village and all three of her sons. It was a holiday, and they were drinking and discussing something warmly—Marina could not tell what. From time to time she heard her sons, too, taking part in the discussion, while moving on their errands to and fro.

At a certain point she heard only her sons' voices and all the others remained silent. The young men were shouting loudly and as usual in agreement, trying to maintain something; they shouted so loudly, all together, and with so many words that they seemed to be more than three.

But suddenly they became mute, and immediately afterwards it seemed to Marina that upon the general silence there fell the name of the good parish priest who had been murdered now more than ten years ago.

Who had uttered it? Marina was dumb-founded, as if unexpectedly someone had read it in her heart, and she could not have said whether that name had been pronounced by man or spirit.

But Giovanni's voice, which had dominated all the rest, was silenced; Francesco's voice was silenced; many other voices were silenced. Antonio's habitual gesture, which Marina saw by the eyes of memory—his hand wandering in a circle over his head as if suddenly caught in a whirlwind—was arrested. Instantaneous death seemed to have fallen upon all.

During that instant of silence, Marina recollected that for a long time she had felt incapable of entering the church and had been aware that it was the same with her sons.

Upon another occasion she wished to speak out her mind entirely to Giovanni, upon whom the blind woman kept her mental eye continually fixed, because she knew her youngest son had been the cause of everything. She knew his influence over his elder brothers. That evening Marina was in bed. From below came the sounds of the shop and of the carts which were being unloaded before the door, noises which always sounded more dreadful to her in her sleepless nights.

That afternoon there had been a great discussion among the Dell' Assunta brothers as to whether they should buy a large house which was for sale in the place, where they could live and set up another shop. Antonio, always pig-headedly averse to any innovation, was opposed to it, as was the old mother, for reasons of her own. She had inveighed with so much fury against Giovanni, who was most obstinate in his wish to buy the house; she had cried out so often that they ought not to, that she seemed like a mad woman, or one possessed. And then after the strain, she had felt a pain in her chest and had had to go to bed earlier than usual.

Lying thus in bed, while the noises of the shop and street floated up to her, she began to think about Giovanni and was seized with rancor against him. She wanted to find a reason for her own conviction that he was the cause of everything, and to this end she reviewed the whole life of her son from his birth, day by day, if possible hour by hour. She could not quite find a reason for it, but she felt certain that at some time or other before the murder, there had been some cause for his conviction which penetrated her soul. She seemed to be always on the point of confirming this idea, no matter how—by an action, talk, a word, some gesture, even a glance of the lad—by something which would prove an illumination, a revelation! And then the particular fact escaped her; but the conviction remained deep in her maternal conscience. So she had resolved to speak openly with Giovanni.

Suddenly the latter came in, perhaps to persuade her about the house. The question that she would have to put to him in a few moments seemed so horrible to Marina that she sprang up in bed, terrified, just as she had on that far-off night of the murder. She seemed to hear the wind shaking the house and the roof trembling beneath the deluge. She saw blood in the darkness of her blindness. She began to stammer something, when Giovanni interrupted her:

"Come, come, mother, put an end to these thoughts!"

And a moment later the blind woman felt the spectre's name fall from her lips! But Giovanni had already left the room. And from that day, mother and son avoided being left alone together.

"He had already read it in my thoughts before I spoke," thought Marina, and she added: "He knows very well that I know everything!"

But heaven still continued to overwhelm the Dell' Assunta brothers with gifts. Their prosperity grew like a grain of good seed in a fertile soil. They sowed with good fortune and more abundantly year by year. By now the fine house had risen to the roof hour by hour, brick by brick, and the idlers who stopped to gaze at it with wide eyes began to weave fables as to whose it would be.

It was said that the Dell' Assuntas had saved sums and sums of money, and the village countrywomen, when talking to Marina, placed their hands on her shoulder, saying:

"Lucky you, oh, lucky you!"

But the blind woman raised her head to remind them of her own blindness, not being able to show them her soul; and they went away thinking that the devil in carrying off her eyes had carried off all the evil too and left only good.

"Lucky you, lucky you! For the Lord has blessed your family and good fortune has come to your house. Your prayers have surely been answered, Marina!"

The Physicians of the Murine Eye Remedy Company, Chicago, U. S. A., Oculists of years' standing, carefully prepare "The Murine Eye Remedies" in the Company's Laboratory. These Remedies are the result of their Clinical, Hospital and Private Practice, and they have found from their years of experience with Children's Eyes, that two drops of Murine in each Eye of the Growing Child is of inestimable value. Murine is an Eye Tonic and they know, if it is used regularly, that it Tones the Eye of the Growing Child and in many instances obviates the use of Glasses, and is it not reasonable that Glasses when not required will retard the development of a young and growing Eye?

Murine, through its Tonic effect, Stimulates Healthy Circulation and thus promotes the normal development of the Eye. We do not believe there is a Mother who has used Murine in her own Eyes and in the Eyes of the members of her family who would be without it, or who is not willing to speak of its Merits as The Household Friend.

The Child in the Schoolroom needs Murine. Murine contains no harmful or prohibited Drugs, and conforms to the Laws of the Country.

Druggists everywhere will supply Murine and tell you of its gratifying results.

A DAINTY TOILET ARTICLE

Every lady who desires to keep up her attractive appearance, while at the Theatre, attending Receptions, when shopping, while traveling and on all occasions should carry in her purse a booklet of Gouraud's Oriental Beauty Leaves. This is a dainty little booklet of exquisitely perfumed powdered leaves which are easily removed and applied to the skin. It is invaluable when the face becomes moist and flushed and is far superior to a powder puff as it does not spill and soil the clothes. It removes dirt, soot and grease from the face, imparting a cool delicate bloom to the complexion. Sent anywhere on receipt of Ten Cents in stamps or coin. F. T. Hopkins, 37 Great Jones Street, New York.

ness was run by Francesco, who had long since given up going his rounds with the donkey. A rubicund stoutness was now added to his gravity, and that being the most manifest sign that he had nothing further to desire for his body, there now arose in his heart a certain ambition for some of the honors attainable in the village or commune. When the workmen's union of the commune was talked of in the shop, Francesco revealed this ambition by a grave and benevolent smile that diffused itself over his large, rubicund visage. He had completely forgotten his donkey and the pedler business.

But Antonio was still the beast of burden. It even seemed that prosperity produced in him the curious effect of making him lose his tongue more than ever. He became more strong-limbed and less talkative, displaying his muscles but hiding his thoughts; a true son of his father and of the grand-parents, fishermen and cobblers, men who had fists as hard as stones and brains as solid as their own knees.

But Giovanni knew how to enjoy their prosperity regally. His spirit seemed to expand and become vaster as his condition improved daily. He now employed men to attend to the details of the business, and launched new enterprises and speculations. A large new shop, which proved a mine of wealth to the family, had been opened in the chief locality of the commune. He there displayed almost genteel fashions and costumes, and with his true masterly spirit managed to make himself the first of the place. Everyone admired and loved the jolly, industrious and energetic young man, who could arrange fetes so well, and could give work to so many, and who succeeded in making his voice heard in the municipality and even higher.

"Lucky you! Oh, lucky you!" repeated the country women to Marina, referring to Giovanni. And many mothers hoped to give their daughter in marriage to him, and many maidens secretly lost their hearts to him; for besides all the rest, Giovanni was extremely handsome.

"Lucky you!" repeated the women to Marina, placing their hands on her shoulder. "Every family ought to have such a son."

But the blind old woman, under a physical instinct of distrust, shrank beneath the pressure of those envious hands, and shut herself up like a little snail. From the depths of her being she heard confusedly the blessings of the village women like one who from the basement floor of a house hears the noises of the upper stories. And she stayed with her head upon her breast, watching the spectre of blood within her.

Thus the years continued to accumulate upon the shoulders of the old woman, who made herself smaller and smaller inside her arm-chair, as the prosperity of the family increased. It increased visibly still. If providence could be likened to prodigal persons, it might be said that she was seized by a frenzy of prodigality in benefiting the Dell' Assunta brethren.

As they were now rolling in abundance, each wished to take a wife. They were all three happily married in three consecutive summers in the dog-days: Antonio to a stout peasant girl as florid and as fertile as her own fat and sunny fields; Francesco to the daughter of a wealthy landowner who brought him a large sum as dowry and great hope of public honors; Giovanni to the richest, prettiest and brightest girl of the district. They were all three splendid brides, and all three proved themselves splendid in the maternal way and in bringing up their offspring.

A large habitation received the three new families, still united in a single family by the firm wills of the husbands, who knew how to suppress all spirit of discord in their wives.

Then Marina was not simply the old mother; but to the rude fancy of the sons she began to represent more than formerly something that they could not in the least define. However it was, they not only showed great affection towards her, but even felt a sort of religious superstition for her, as for a family idol. Perhaps they looked upon her as the talisman of their good luck. And Marina had really something sacred and mysterious about her—something akin to a little dark idol—being nearly always mute, shut up like a snail, all wrinkles and bones, in an apparent continual somnolency. Perhaps such senile desolation and inertia in the midst of the joyful, busy family, were evils which attracted by contrast.

According to the old habit, to which they unwittingly gave a superstitious significance, the sons still deposited in her hands certain sums, as in former times they had deposited their day's earnings. They were the offerings to the little idol. But her hands were no longer raised to the level of her extinguished eyes, and they felt burdened by the excessive weight of the money. Yet Marina knew it was only a minimum part, at most, of the family gains.

These gains must have been fabulous, according to the rumors of the many transactions that the somnolent old woman succeeded in seizing about her vast house and from the talk of the peasant woman. The latter exaggerated, painting what she could not see in the brightest possible colors of the popular imagination. They spoke, too, of the beauty of her daughters-in-law, and when Marina felt her daughters-in-law about her, she pictured to herself their beauty, but it was a terrifying kind of beauty, for it had nothing of this world in it; and if they addressed her or touched her, their voices and their warm young fingers penetrated to the depths of her being, to where the spectre of blood lay, and revived it. For her daughters-in-law represented the greatest part of her sons' fortune: they, belonging to the richest families in the country, whom Marina remembered having worked for at one time, represented the richest harvest gathered from the seed of the long-ago crime.

But her daughters-in-law did not notice the effect they produced on their mother-in-law's mind, and continued to cherish her just like an idol in the most intimate corner of the house, obedient to the will of their husbands who ruled them.

Thus Marina, from the depths of her armchair, from her august circle of darkness and silence, participated in the life of the three united families.

It was a life of unwearied and varied work, which sometimes reached Marina, like the throbbing of great machines always in action—great mysterious machines that fanned the air about her face. It was upon family fetes, when there were big dinners, that Marina felt her little sightless head all in a whirl, in the midst of the smoking dishes never seen by her, and the uproar of the unknown guests who devoured the food in company with her daughters-in-law and sons.

Then there was the wail of infants. The cries of children struck Marina with special terror.

On certain nights she was startled in her poor bed by a wail, and it seemed to her that the whole house was filled with them, and that it was a bad omen for the morrow, for it was calling on Death!

Death had not yet entered her house. Births, births, always births! And Marina knew that the first time would not be for her.

To her the children, crying loudly to their fathers and mothers, were the voices of the spectre and of the justice of God. Fear of God's justice stirred Marina to the depths of her decrepit womb whence had issued the three children whom the justice of God had marked out to strike sooner or later, after having lavished all gifts upon them. When Marina from her bed heard the infants' wails, it seemed to her that the justice of God must strike on the morrow.

And on the morrow it finally came. A hurricane burst upon the three Dell' Assunta families!

At first an epidemic, which was creeping about the country, attacked the children and carried off the greater part. Some months later, Antonio died. He was followed in the course of three years by Francesco and one of the wives. The superstitious were appalled, seeing that Death had taken up his abode in their house. For it was not Death that struck down and passed on; it was an enemy that had penetrated the house and there practised his sorceries.

Illness and reversals of fortune of all kinds continually harrassed the Dell' Assuntas, even between the pauses of Death. They were so convinced it was their necessary fate to be carried off one after the other that a sort of suspicion and mutual hostility was born among them, on account of the lust each one had to outlive the others. The ties of blood were broken. The instinct of self-preservation under the repeated assault of Death apparently prohibited all concord, all speech—they fled from each other! They took their meals together, nearly always without speaking, each with his head bent over his plate, hardly tasting the food they ate in silent sadness. Then they separated.

All work had ceased. The vast house sounded no longer, it seemed empty, peopled by a few shadows. Marina seemed to have spread her circle of darkness and silence over all the house. The country people, who had watched open-mouthed when the Dell' Assunta family built up their own fortunes so successfully, were now dismayed at seeing it swept away by misfortune at one fell blow. Their fate was the topic of all conversation, and everyone looked upon that house with a kind of superstitious fear.

And the last blow came: Giovanni and Marina were left alone!

During a whole year the mother and son had exchanged perhaps only four words. Marina was now nothing but a breath in a sack of bones and wrinkles. She sat in the corner where the daughters-in-law had once cherished her, listening to the strokes of death around her. From time to time some voice was silenced, Marina heard it no longer. All sounds of children's cries were gone.

She realized then that she was the mistress of the house, only now she did not feel, and could hardly measure, its vastness. Her blindness and silence had taken possession of it too.

One only sometimes moved quickly about it with almost furtive step. What was he doing? Was he awaiting his hour?

One day Marina, wishing to know, asked an old servant.

Giovanni had become the ghost of himself, but there was still something in him which refused to yield to fate. His eyes were devoured with the fire of continual fever; and sometimes, the servant recounted, he fixed them with a look which struck terror into those present. He seemed to be looking for the cause of his misery.

And Giovanni's hour came too.

The confessor arrived and stayed long at the pillow of the dying man, while Marina trembled elsewhere with the small spark of life remaining to her.

Later on, the confessor came out to say that her dying son wished to see his mother once more. So the latter was carried in to his bedside, seated there, and left alone with him.

He then confessed everything to her, with the death-rattle in his throat, which seemed to contain also some accent of dull anger.

The crime had been committed, but only a little money had been stolen. All the Dell' Assuntas' fortune must now be bestowed on the church and the poor, for the eternal salvation of those who were dead, of him who was dying, and of the surviving mother. This last will and testament had been passed on from one death-bed to another, and was now left by Giovanni to the mother.

Giovanni being dead, Marina repeated continually to herself that only a little money had been stolen, yet everything must now be bestowed upon the church and the poor, this being the last wish of the dead, passed on from one pillow to another and so to her.

But she had no longer strength either to act or speak. Only a little money had been stolen! And Marina had no strength left, because now her maternal instincts and family ties of affection formed the sole remaining scrap of life within her. In her darkness and decrepitude she felt incapable of doing anything; and certainly she could have done nothing, could not even have uttered one word, without the entire discovery of what her sons had done.

As Death came gradually upon her, she repeated to herself:

"I only will atone for it! My sons sleep in God's pardon. I only will atone!"

And Marina feared God; but the days went by and the fear of revealing her family secret prevented her from forming any resolution.

"I only will atone!"

One day she was found dead in her arm-chair, with two drops of blood in the corners of her eyes.

Auto Notes

J. W. Leavitt and wife have left for the Overland factory at Toledo. Their stay in the East will be of indefinite duration. Leavitt expects to learn the factory and its workings from the bottom up and as soon as the next season's cars begin to go out he will personally superintend the shipments to the Pacific Coast.

Tony Nichols, president of the Weinstock Nichols Company, has returned from an extensive two months' visit to the East on which he was accompanied by his wife. While gone Nichols took occasion to visit the Morgan & Wright and other leading rubber concerns of the East, giving particular attention to the automobile tire situation. Provisions were made by Nichols for unusually heavy shipments of Morgan & Wright tires, especially Nobby Treads, to this section during the coming automobile year.

The Pioneer Automobile Company, agents for the Hudson automobile, are in receipt of advices to the effect that Richard Bacon Jr. and P. B. Stubbs, known to many of the automobile trade in the services of other companies, are members of the Hudson sales staff.

H. H. Riley of Coalinga, accompanied by his brother, passed through town recently for Tahoe. He was driving his Oakland "30" roadster.

C. E. Mathewson, manager of the San Francisco branch of the Diamond Rubber Company, has left for an extensive hunting trip in the northern part of the State. Accompanying him is Frank Fageol, Oakland agent for the Rambler. Their destination is Mayor Mott's ranch, 150 miles north of Yreka. The trip is being made in a Rambler car.

J. C. Wagner, Dorris agent at Dunsmuir, recently made a sale of rather peculiar nature. Wagner took a car for his personal use and demonstrating and had run it about 5,000 miles, including a trip to Reno with return by San Francisco. When a rancher asked for a demonstration Wagner took him out, hit the hardest roads in Siskiyou County and took the steep grades with such ease that the prospective purchaser insisted on buying the machine that they were in.

In his first attempt at auto driving, D. S. Dorn, the well known attorney, recently completed a trip of nearly 5,000 miles in his Chalmers car. So enthused was he over his success that on returning he tried for the amateur record between Menlo Park and Del Monte and captured it by making the run in two hours and forty minutes.

A remarkable instance of tire service is that given by the Diamonds that equip the Parry, the winning car in the Oklahoma City six day reliability run. The entire run over roads that the press declared most impassable was made without one puncture. The tires had already given 4,000 miles of service.

C. A. Hawkins, Pacific Coast manager of the White Co., has received word that W. & J. Sloane & Company, the well known firm, has just taken delivery of six White gasoline trucks for the use of their big New York branch.

In a remarkable run of thirteen days J. B. Linezey of Denver has just lowered the record from that city to Los Angeles by three days with a Thomas "60" car. The entire trip of 1657 miles was made without a single accident. Monogram oil was the lubricant used.

According to advices just received by S. G. Chapman, Guy Vaughn, the well known driver in Eastern auto racing circles, has just taken delivery of a Hupmobile from H. J. Koehler & Co., New York representatives for the machine.

W. H. Thomson, secretary of the Standard Motor Car Co., has returned from a business trip to Los Angeles. Thomson reports that the demand for automobiles continues to hold up in the southern metropolis. The farmers particularly are buying cars now. An unusually large number of Ford deliveries are being made.

A letter received by S. G. Chapman from the Oakland Motor Car factory of Pontiac, Michigan, states that the extensive new structures recently erected include a 100,000 gallon steel tank which will furnish water for the whole plant and also supply the patent fire extinguisher system with which all the buildings are equipped.

1911 CHALMERS MOTOR CARS

WILL ARRIVE AUGUST 15th

Refined But Practically Unchanged 1909 and 1910 Good Enough

The Chalmers cars come from a factory producing quality and not quantity. THE CHALMERS PRINCIPLE is not to make as many cars as possible, but TO MAKE EACH INDIVIDUAL CAR AS GOOD AS POSSIBLE.

We regret that we were not able to furnish 1909 and 1910 models to all who wanted them, and while we fear that some were offended when told that they could not get the cars they wanted, we assure every one that it is much harder to tell a prospective buyer that he cannot have the car than it is to show him why he should have one.

It is possible that the Chalmers factory could build a sufficient number of cars to take care of every available customer, but in so doing they would, like a large number of other factories, sacrifice quality for quantity, and every car sold would not make a customer for another, as has been our experience during the past two years.

A few cars are still available for September delivery.

Genuine Golf Defined

On the terrace of a country club, overlooking a green dotted with sheep, a group of non-golfers were taking tea.

A male non-golfer, who took his tea through a straw, said thoughtfully:

"Golf might be defined as billiards gone to grass."

"Spleen on the green, I'd call it," said a female non-golfer.

"Or the last flicker in the dying fire of athletics," sneered a young football player.

"The misuse of land and language," suggested a tennis champion.

Second Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet southerly from the southerly corner of Golden Gate Avenue (formerly Tyler Street) and Octavia Street, and running thence southerly along the said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly one hundred (100) feet to the easterly line of Octavia Street and to the point of commencement; being a portion of Fifty Vara Lot Number Four (4) in Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152) of the Western Addition of said City and County of San Francisco.

Third Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred and fifty (150) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Golden Gate Avenue with the easterly line of Octavia Street; running thence southerly along said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at right angles easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at right angles westerly one hundred (100) feet to the said easterly line of Octavia Street and point of commencement; being a portion of Western Addition Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that Ogdén Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute and that their title to said property be established and quieted, subject only to the possession of plaintiff for the purposes of administration; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be met in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 16th day of July, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
(Seal) By M. P. BRUTON, Deputy Clerk.

Memorandum—The first publication of this summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 23rd day of July, A. D. 1910.

Another Book by Mrs. Voynich

To put into words any comment or criticism on "An Interrupted Friendship" by Mrs. E. L. Voynich is too much like turning into public gossip the intimate affairs of a dead and dearly loved friend for the sake of a few filthy dollars. To see the book become a best-seller in the hands of every giggling, gum-chewing curiosity monger would be an indignity little less in degree than that of being a voluntary spectator to the loathsome ill treatment to which its hero was subjected. Rather would one ask that a chosen and appreciative few should read it in reverent silence as they would pay their last visit to a departed friend. About thirteen years ago the first novel by Mrs. E. L. Voynich made its appearance. It was published under the title "The Gadfly" and proved to be a thrilling story of Italian politics in the early years of the nineteenth century. "An Interrupted Friendship" is but her fourth volume and is her work of the popular, catch-penny order to be devoured in street cars and elevators. Most people seem to dislike it, as they dislike anything which departs from the conventional two hens squabbling over one worm. It is likely to make them think and they do not know how, therefore, to all who adore pretty love stories there is this advice to be given: "Let alone not only "An Interrupted Friendship" and its predecessor but likewise "Jack Raymond" and "Olive Latham." They are not designed to furnish heedless joy, like a musical farce comedy. There is no happy ending, for the author is relentless in the logic of her sequences and there are no eleventh hour miracles. The Macmillan Company who are the publishers of "An Interrupted Friendship" have earned our gratitude not only for the book itself but for their discriminating taste in omitting illustrations.

Off the Beaten Track

"The Arch Satirist" is a novel rather off the beaten track for its scenes are all laid in Montreal and though the theme is the sacrifices of mother-love the mother sacrifices not herself but her unloved elder daughter for the benefit of the adored son of a second marriage. The situation is common enough in life but the novelist fights shy of it and even in this case Frances de Wolfe Fenwick is more apologetic than condemnatory. Grim as the plot is there is abundance of humor to offset it and one of the episodes would draw a smile from a wooden doll. The charming stupidity of one character mimics the "conversation" of the ordinary sweet-girl to the life Lothrop, Lee and Shepard are the publishers.

A Story Worth Reading

In "The Carleton Case" Ellery H. Clark has harked back to the "Ballad of the Wicked Uncle" who used to figure in as many family tragedies as the heartless stepmother, though of late years the tendency has been to lay all sins and shortcomings on the shoulders of the maiden aunt. Mr. Clark writes good English and he does not pad. If he had been writing a detective yarn we might find fault with him for letting his readers surmise the sequel to the crime but he is really concerned with character and the homicide is not a climax gradually worked up to. It is one of those things which just happen without premeditation and the moral question involved is less that of having deprived a fellow creature of life than what, all things considered, is the best course to follow once the mischief is done. It is a question each of us must answer for ourselves, the rigid moralists agreeing that it is a duty to tell everything while others, just as good citizens, will consider that the greatest good of the greatest number should be consulted and the accidental criminal, being neither a lunatic at large nor given to outbursts of passion in general, will be no more likely to do the same thing again after a trial than before. The story is worth reading. From the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

On the Race Question

The theme which has engaged Octave Thanet in her latest novel, "By Inheritance" is the negro race in America and the unavoidable and not to be evaded fact that there are differences between them and the whites, planted in the beginning of time and ineradicable. The author is no tractarian and the reader need not fear that the book will prove other than an interesting story provided there is no stirring of the soil. Octave Thanet always has something to say when she sits down to write. "By Inheritance" ought to prove one of the most important books of the year. From the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

A Romance of the Air

Herbert Quick has done so many things in the course of his life that a new departure should not provoke astonishment, though his name has appeared so often in the index of magazines as the contributor of grave economic essays that one would, naturally, expect him to adopt historical or economic themes and write solemnly serious novels. Instead he seems to take to romancing as a recreation and to leave his gravity where he would a dress suit on a fishing tramp. "Virginia of the Air Lines" is a rollicking story. Decidedly its most thrilling chapter is that which chronicles the duel between an airship and a submarine. As the first romance of the air, unless we except "Sigurd Eckdal's Bride" which described an attempt to discover the pole by a balloon voyage, "Virginia of the Air Lines" should reap the success of timeliness. Published by the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

A Story for Men

A story credited to the late Justice Brewer has it that, while he was judge in a minor court, he was presiding at the trial of a wife's suit for separation and alimony. The defendant acknowledged that he hadn't spoken to his wife in five years, and Judge Brewer took a hand from the bench in examining the witness.

"What explanation have you," he said severely to the defendant, "for not speaking to your wife in five years?"

"Your Honor," replied the husband, "I didn't like to interrupt the lady."

She (to partner claiming first dance)—You are an early bird, Mr. Glossinest.

He (gallantly)—Yes; and by jove! I've caught the worm!

"Alas!" sighed the poet, "the world does not understand me."

"Well, cheer up," rejoined the practical person. "That is something to be thankful for, I'm sure."

Bill—Do you remember that $10 I loaned you a year ago?

Jill—Yes, I recall it now.

Bill—I wish to gracious I could!

Thousand Oaks

Berkeley

Location

Thousand Oaks is in North Berkeley, one and a half miles from the University—the same distance as Claremont. When the lines that are now building are completed, in the early spring, one can reach the University in ten minutes by either street car or Southern Pacific interurban.

Thousand Oaks is just west of where J. H. Spring is spending over $100,000 on the grounds alone, preparing a 20 acre villa site for his future home—the neighborhood is the finest.

Every home-site in this natural park has an individuality. There are huge moss covered rocks and a myriad of giant oaks throughout the entire tract.

Thousand Oaks is on an elevation that slopes toward the south and west, commanding an unequalled panoramic view of the bay district, including Berkeley, Oakland, San Francisco and the Golden Gate.

And while this property will soon be the most valuable home section of Berkeley, right now, before the trains start running, you can purchase a home-site at a very modest price.

Our terms are one-tenth down and one per cent a month, with no interest nor taxes for two years from date of purchase.

Write or telephone and we will mail you full information, price list, etc., or take you out to the property in an automobile.

Who Is the Chronicle's Candidate?

Though the Chronicle's predictions regarding the outcome of the primary election proved erroneous our esteemed contemporary has, nevertheless, renewed the courage of its prescience. A new light having dawned on the Chronicle's perceptive faculties it is once more looking into the seeds of time and vaticinating thus: "Mr. Bell will not be elected!" Now the question is, By whom is Mr. Bell to be defeated? We assume that this is the question because we have learned from the authority of the Chronicle that the Hon. Hiram Johnson is impossible. On August 6th the Chronicle said, "But whatever doubt there may be in regard to whom the Republicans may nominate for Governor there is a unanimous opinion that Alden Anderson is the only Republican who can be elected." Furthermore: "It is the general, well-informed Republican belief, so far as it has come to the knowledge of the Chronicle, that unless the Republicans nominate Mr. Anderson, Theodore Bell will be the next Governor." But, as we have said, a new light has dawned, one that clarifies the situation, enabling our contemporary to see that while "there are many things to show that the California Democrats are in quite a state of exhilaration over the present political outlook," the truth is, "they are deceiving themselves." So we are not to look for Mr. Bell's election. But nowhere does the Chronicle tell us that Mr. Johnson is to be elected. It merely tells us why Bell's defeat is inevitable. It is inevitable because he is a free trader. Thus the Chronicle: "Regardless of the result of a primary which indicated great division in the Republican party, there may at no time be any signs of disagreement as to the necessity of maintaining the protective system, if the industries of the State as they now stand are to continue in existence." Nevertheless if we are to accept our esteemed contemporary as authority, as it has always been our pleasure to do, we cannot assume that Republicans will look to Mr. Johnson for assistance toward the perpetuation of the protective system. According to the Chronicle of August 8th, "Alden Anderson is the one Republican candidate for Governor who stands solidly for the protective principles as interpreted by the Republican party." Moreover, "Of the other candidates (in the primary campaign) Johnson expressly repudiates it." And we find in the Chronicle of August 7th, with reference to Johnson, these words: "There are multitudes of stalwart Republicans who will hold that if Democratic principles are to prevail, the Democratic party should bear the responsibility!" Thus the Chronicle seems to imply that as between Johnson and Bell stalwart Republicans will prefer the latter. But in the light of post-primary utterances this implication must be regarded as a slip of the typewriter. It is not to be squared with the positive assurance that "Mr. Bell will not be elected." So we say the paramount question is, By whom is Mr. Bell to be defeated? We are on the tiptoe of expectancy for an apocalypse. Our delphic contemporary has our undivided attention.

The Political Outlook

After a prayerful and, we humbly and sincerely hope, an unbiased analysis of the situation we find ourselves inclined to the opinion that the election of Theodore Bell is far from being beyond the realm of probability. Indeed we can see many plausible incentives to exhilaration among Democrats. Even after viewing the matter from the Chronicle's standpoint we are not at a loss to account for the felicitations which the prospect has evoked from the friends of the Democratic standard bearer. With all due deference to the Chronicle's cocksureness, wherein it reminds us of the Infallible One now bloviating frenetically through the emotional Middle West, we humbly dissent from the dictum that Mr. Bell cannot be elected because Republicans will not vote for a free-trader. Aside from the fact that Mr. Bell is not a free-trader what is there in the history of California politics to persuade us that Republicans are fearful of the awful consequences of electing a Democrat to the gubernatorial office? It is within the memory of man that James H. Budd was elected Governor of California and likewise Washington Bartlett, both of the Jeffersonian faith. It is far from being a political secret that Franklin K. Lane received a majority of the votes cast for Governor when he ran against Dr. Pardee and that without making much difference ultimately to the people of the state he was counted out on account of the technical blunders of some of his constituents. It will probably be remembered that Theodore Bell came pretty close to election four years ago, notwithstanding the activities of another Democrat running on the Independence League ticket. So it is evident that the defeat of a Democrat is not a foregone conclusion in California. Why it should be argued to the contrary at this time when the Republican party is rent by factional strife we are wholly unable to conjecture. Hardly are we to suppose it to be on account of the great preponderance of Republican votes as revealed by the records in the offices of registration. As there was no contest among Democrats at the primary there was no occasion for them to register. Yet, undoubtedly many did register as Republicans, some for the strategic purpose of effecting the nomination of the weakest man and some because they had been importuned to sign the petitions of Republican friends. So there is no conclusion to be cocksurely drawn from figures, which in this as in most instances point to what is more apparent than real. Nor are we to construe the vote that Mr. Johnson received as testimony, either of great popularity or of an aroused and rampant public sentiment. The noisiest of campaigners, the avowed and vehement enemy of the much reviled machine, the putative embodiment of a most precious and paramount principle, the standard-bearer of the fanatical element whose enthusiasm is born of passion and prejudice, yet the vote he received does not indicate that he electrified the people or filled them with apprehension. The vote he received was a minority of his party vote, and it was a small percentage of the registered vote. Thousands of people who had taken the trouble to register did not take the trouble to assist in averting the crisis which the loud voice in the wilderness had been heralding. Now the probability is that Mr. Johnson received at the primary election nearly as many votes as he will get at the general election. For his appeal is to the fanatic who is always an ardent partisan, never apathetic, first to the polls and last to get wise. We believe the fanatic vote is all in. We are almost certain that Mr. Johnson cannot be elected by the unsophisticated and superheated element of our citizenry. On him devolves the task of seducing thousands of Republicans who abhor humbug more than a low tariff. He must command the confidence and support of an undivided party. Furthermore he must not be affected to any great extent by the enthusiasm which has been infused into the ranks of Democracy since the close of registration. Since the removal of the Bryan incubus and the breaking out of the Bronco Buster there has been a strong tendency among Democrats to get together as well as a strong impulse among Republicans to drift apart. These are phenomena which Mr. Johnson must in some way render innocuous to accomplish his purpose. We cannot conceive how this is to be done, and therefore while we do not agree with the Chronicle that Mr. Bell cannot be elected we are inclined to be in accord with that journal's views regarding the hopelessness of Mr. Johnson's ambition.

The Osawatimie Oration

They who had not the good fortune to be among those present on the occasion of Colonel Roosevelt's Osawatimie speech are not qualified to dispute the judgment of the enthusiastic gentlemen who have pronounced it "the greatest speech of Mr. Roosevelt's life." Eloquence does not consist in matter alone; not merely in speech or in words, but in manner also, in voice, eye and gesture, in the stimulus of the occasion which produces it, and last but not least, in the magic of sympathy, the average audience being better supplied with ears to be tickled than understandings to judge. And hence it is those of us who had not the pleasure of hearing the Colonel's dauntless spirit speaking on his tongue, or seeing it beaming from his eye in fine frenzy rolling are incompetent to discuss the merits of the oration. On the printed page it is like a withered flower—the substance is there, but the color is faded, the perfume is gone. In cold type the speech doesn't remind us either of Cicero in one of his Philippics or Demosthenes on the Crown. Nor, indeed, does it convey the impression that Mr. Roosevelt surpassed himself at Osawatimie either in the power of his logic, the quality of his rhetoric or the profundity of his thought. If he expressed any new ideas on that occasion we have been unable to ferret them out. If he proposed any new policies, any new rules of action, any new principles of government, the most careful and conscientious reading has failed to discover them. Fresh from the linotype the speech smacks distinctly of Roosevelt neither at his best nor at his worst—of Roosevelt in process of damnable iteration. There is not a new thrill in all the waste of words, not a new thought in the whole chaos of ponderous platitudes. Absolutely nothing was said that we have not heard before from the lips of this peripatetic orator. The thought that suggests itself as we read the speech is that perhaps the fountain is running dry, the source of inspiration becoming exhausted. "I stand for the square deal," said Mr. Roosevelt. Surely we have heard some great personage say that before. Also this: "Our government, national and state, must be freed from the sinister influence or control of special interests." Likewise: "We must have complete and effective publicity of corporate affairs;" and, "The object of government is the welfare of the people." These are but a few of many familiar sentiments and paraphrased aphorisms, some of which were preached in ancient Athens by men that produced a tired feeling among the people and were banished. The square deal is precisely what Aristides stood for; and it was because Catiline wanted the square deal for his followers and the consulship for himself that he hatched his famous conspiracy. The strong central government that Mr. Roosevelt so warmly advocated at Osawatimie he advocated in many messages to Congress, and even his approval of the direct primary was not in the nature of a surprise, for since his return from Africa he has more than once disavowed publicly his former private characterization of the direct primary as "a device of the millionaire and the demagogue." And it is but natural that Mr. Roosevelt should favor the direct primary, as it is but natural, for him to feel that "we need to make our political representatives more quickly and sensitively responsive to the people." It is characteristic of the ambitious self-seeker who has no conscientious scruples against coddling the people and indulging their whims and caprices, to feel that it is to his advantage to deal directly with the people. There never was a demagogue who didn't believe that he could flatter the people sufficiently to retain a permanent hold on their affections.

Why He Persists

Far be it from us to attempt a task so apparently futile as the depreciation of Colonel Roosevelt's views on any subject. The only point we wish to make respecting the Osawatimie speech is that impressive as it may have been it was nothing more than a rehash of the Colonel himself. And this point we consider worthy of reflection by those who for the purpose of intellectual exercise may care to ponder the curious psychological phenomenon which has grown out of Mr. Roosevelt's relations with the people. It appears that it really doesn't matter what the Colonel says; nay, that even if he has nothing to say the people are eager to hear him say it, and are prepared to be entranced as he pours out the flood of his verbosity. It doesn't matter if what he says is the most transparent flubdub, the people give him all their ears and applaud vociferously, bearing out precisely what Amiel tells us in his diary is the inevitable consequence of democracy—one of time's revenges, the apotheosis of charlatanry, the triumph of mediocrity. In his Osawatimie speech Mr. Roosevelt told the people that almost everything essential to their welfare could be accomplished by the direct primary coupled with a "corrupt practices act effective to prevent the advantage of the man willing recklessly and unscrupulously to spend money over his more honest competitor." How this corrupt practices act is to be made effective he did not suggest; it was unnecessary for him to suggest. The people have faith in the Colonel's omnipotence. God merely said, "Let there be light" and behold! darkness was dispelled. By the same token the dear people assume Mr. Roosevelt will say "Let the corrupt practices act be effective!" and immediately every job-chaser will have a square deal. Nothing can shake the people's faith in the Colonel. In office he demonstrated the soundness of the old maxim, "He that is lavish in words is a niggard in deed;" and along came his successor to show us that the man of few words has a faculty for achievement, but the people are unmindful of the lesson. In public esteem the Colonel's words continue to approximate those of holy writ. It is not what he does but what he says that they like. It is a matter of history that Mr. Roosevelt's personal solicitations to Mr. Harriman to raise money for election purposes resulted in the latter's contributing $50,000 of his own and getting $210,000 from others. It is known that Mr. Roosevelt threw out deceitful bait to induce Mr. Harriman to do this thing. It is known that the money was used for corrupt purposes in New York. Yet Mr. Roosevelt can still make broad his phylacteries and excite uproarious enthusiasm by advocating a corrupt practices act, and praying in the street corners against all manner of political and other foulness and uncleanness. He can denounce nature-fakers for talking on subjects about which they are not informed, and at the same time peg himself up in public esteem by affecting to be better versed in the science of law than all the members of the highest tribunal in the land. Assuredly Mr. Roosevelt exercises a powerful sway over the public mind. What the explanation of it is no man knoweth. Has he hypnotized the people, or have the people hypnotized themselves? Now, it is easy enough to account for his acquisition of dominion over the mind of the people. There was nothing clairvoyant or mysterious about that. The public mind was prepared for him by such distinguished propagandists as William R. Hearst and Thomas Lawson, and by the innumerable apostles of unrest and stimulators of class hatred, as well as by the brazen effrontery of our sodden plutocracy. He arrived at a psychological moment and seized opportunity by the forelock. So the question is not, How did he acquire dominion? The question is, How does he hold it? And the answer to the question is not to be suggested by any single hypothesis. The persistence of the Roosevelt obsession may be accounted for in part by the enemies he has made; in part by the circumstance that he is typical of the average citizen. In Mr. Roosevelt are embodied all the salient qualities of American philistinism. To a people that worships success, energy and force, that loves bluster, applauds pretension, and is always to be transported by denunciation, it is but natural that Mr. Roosevelt should appear to be an ideal leader.

Perspective Impressions

Nothing is sacred but humbug.

Walter Macarthur tells us that he stands for the Democracy only when the Democracy is right. And of course Walter always knows when it is right. His friends tell us that he is a man of rare intelligence, but the truth is he is a superman of divine intelligence.

Two of Mr. Hearst's contemporaries, the Chippie Call and the Boughten Bulletin, are complaining that he does not print Colonel Roosevelt's speeches. They have yet to understand that Mr. Hearst is playing a little joke at their expense. He is demonstrating that he can vouchsafe all his contemporaries a daily scoop without affecting his, or improving their, circulation. Thus we learn that the Hearst papers are in a class by themselves.

It will be interesting to learn how many Republicans there are in California that will approve the turning down of a resolution endorsing President Taft.

Mr. Taft doesn't speak so often as his predecessor, but both remind us of what Sydney Smith once observed—that there is the same difference between the tongues of some men as between the hour and the minute hand; one goes ten times as fast and the other signifies ten times as much.

When Colonel Roosevelt was shown a copy of the New York Post which said disagreeable things about him he pointed out that the same paper supported Parker against him for the Presidency in 1904. Which is of course conclusive of the unspeakable character of Mr. Roosevelt's critic.

"The attack of Roosevelt on the Supreme Court," says the Socialist Call of New York, "shows further that we Socialists have been lamentably timid." Indeed they have, but the red flag flaming between the Colonel's jaws will give them the necessary courage provided they keep their ears on it.

We have learned of another occupation for our ex-Presidents, one, however, that men of normal sensibilities may be disinclined to follow. Taken off his guard at Fargo by a harmless crank the Colonel confessed that he was serving as a peripatetic advertisement for the weekly paper to which he contributes. The Colonel is unquestionably the only man that ever occupied the White House who could establish this precedent without mortification either to himself or "My people."

P. H. McCarthy on Goats

Consisting of a Purely Imaginary Conversation wherein Our Chief Executive Displays Recondite Classical and Historical Knowledge anent an Animal that Figured in a Recent Interview

By Edward F. O'Day

The learned Father Prout, parish priest of Watergrasshill, lamented the fact that his distinguished countryman and contemporary, the rollicking Dr. Maginn, did not fulfill his promise to publish a great historical work on the mayors of Cork. Great mayors Cork undoubtedly had and if Dr. Maginn had so far overcome his constitutional objection to all unnecessary labor as to compile their annals the world would have been enriched by a curious volume. But Cork is not the only city which has had great mayors. There is San Francisco for instance. The last four mayors of San Francisco, to go no further back, have been men of unusual qualities and well worth perpetuation in history. All of them have had a decided leaning toward literature. Of the literary achievements of Mayors Phelan and Taylor it is needless to remind the reader and although Mayor Schmitz was pre-eminently a musician it must be remembered that he put his pen in ink on a certain memorable occasion to indite a testimonial for Abe Ruef, a bit of literary composition which, measured by its effect, was one of the most important documents that ever emanated from a mayoral sanctum. But it is of the literary work of him whom our tautological newspaper reporters are wont to call "the present incumbent" that I desire to speak. I have forgotten for the nonce in what county of Ireland Mayor McCarthy was born, but I would not be a bit surprised to learn that one of his ancestors was numbered among those remarkable mayors of Cork whose unrecorded history Father Prout lamented. Certain it is that the world-famous Castle of Blarney, which is located in the County Cork, was formerly a stronghold of the McCarthy family. The gift of blarney, which our mayor boasts, may find herein a very simple explanation. If he has not himself imprinted a chaste salute on the magic stone, probably one of his ancestors did it for him. But that is neither here nor there. The fact is that we have a literary mayor and have done nothing to herald him to the world. New York's Mayor Gaynor is known everywhere as the man who rediscovered the slave-philosopher Epictetus and Toledo's Mayor Brand Whitlock gets into all the magazines month after month. But Mayor McCarthy has never been press-agented as a litterateur. I was forcibly reminded of this lack when I read the mayor's literary composition on the subject of the purchase of the Spring Valley plant and the interview which he accorded one of the morning papers on the subject. I resolved to show to the world the marvelous erudition which Mayor McCarthy possesses. It is true that I did not seek an interview with the mayor. I have not enjoyed converse with him since his inauguration, but if I had interviewed him I am quite sure that something like the following would have ensued:

"Mr. Mayor," you must imagine my saying to His Honor, "I am come to ask you why, in a recent interview about Spring Valley, you made that curious reference to billy goats and nanny goats. This subject of goats, as you must be aware, is one which has assumed tremendous importance during the last few years."

"In my book researches and in my study of mankind," the mayor would, of course, respond, "I have become familiar with various species of goats. I can differentiate the Angora from the Cashmere, the Cashmere from the Nubian and the Nubian from the Telegraph Hill variety. I am thoroughly acquainted with the goat of current slang. In fact, as Sherlock Holmes would say, I am thinking of writing a monograph on the subject."

"Mr. Mayor, would you, so to speak, favor me with a few advance sheets from this great work?"

"With pleasure," would naturally be the mayor's answer. "The bit of argot which speaks of 'getting one's goat' has always been a favorite phrase with me, no doubt because I have been so successful in getting the goats of my political enemies. I have gotten so many goats that my corral is being constantly enlarged. Of course it is not necessary to mention any names in a purely literary conversation like this. But you will remember that Whittier in his justly celebrated poem, 'The Shoemakers,' speaks of the 'dizzy goatherd.' Well, I have so many goats that I might be so described if I ever succumbed to dizziness which I don't."

"What is your opinion of the origin of the phrase, 'I've got his goat'?"

"That question takes us back a long way into antiquity, but as long as Mr. Leffingwell is in the outer office attending to the few light duties of the day and I am not likely to be disturbed I shall be pleased to consider it."

"You notice that in my remarks I spoke of both the billy and the nanny goat. There was no particular reason for that except the purely rhetorical desire to lend emphasis to my sentence. In the Latin of course the billy goat is caper from which we have the obsolete word capreol, meaning nothing more nor less than a plain billy goat. But if I had spoken of a capreol my untutored enemies would never have understood my drift. If we pause a moment on the subject of etymology we will discover several interesting things. The English word caper means a frolicsome skip like that of a goat, a very playful animal; also a prank or an antic. Now if some of my enemies had not cut so many capers I would have found it difficult to get their goats, but they are a frolicsome lot and I have been much amused by their antics."

"Then there is the word caprice. I think it is the celebrated Trench who in his study of words remarks that a caprice is a movement of the mind as unaccountable, as little to be calculated on beforehand, as the springs and bounds of a goat. Trench never said a truer thing. The caprices of politicians in San Francisco are as unaccountable as the movements of a goat on the giddy verge of Telegraph Hill. Some of my actions have been called capricious, in this Spring Valley matter for instance, but I assure you that in this as in everything else I have calculated carefully; McCarthy knows what he is doing."

"Another word that is interesting in this connection is the Scotch word 'capernoity.' It is an adjective meaning crabbed or peevish and it describes the condition of those whose goats I have annexed. I would not be surprised by the way if the men who lose their goats suffered from capric acid in their blood. This acid is so named from the goatishness or hircosity of its odor. It is likewise a fancy of mine that Capricorn, the tenth sign of the Zodiac, presides over my most effective goat-getting. The sun enters Capricorn, as you know, at the winter solstice which is not long after November election time. The goatlike figure by which Capricorn was represented in ancient monuments gives me lively satisfaction around election time. At the last municipal election, if you remember, I not only got a good many goats but made a number of my enemies ride the goat as well."

"But let us pass from the Latin to the Greek word for goat. Tragos is Greek for goat, if you remember. From that word comes tragedy, meaning a goat play. If you have read Athenaeus, a gossip old Greek, you will remember his opinion that tragedy was so named because in Icarium, the village of Attica where tragedy had its origin, the actors wore goatskins. That distinguished scholar John Stuart Blackie seems to agree with him. Still there is room for doubt. Cleve Dam has called my attention to the fact that those early tragedies were performed in honor of Pan, the god of the Arcadian shepherds and the inventor of the flute. Pan, you will recall, was capriped, that is he had the cloven foot of the goat, a circumstance which has caused some divines to identify him with Satan. I could cite you to the interpretation which Augustine in his 'De Civitate Dei' gives to the cry, 'Great Pan is dead,' but it is beside our subject. The important point to remember is that Pan's unexpected appearance filled those who saw him with a sudden and irrational fear called a panic. Now what does that mean? Simply that Pan got their goats. At any rate I have frequently created panics by my unexpected appearance and every time I have got a fellow's goat it has been a tragedy for him, though it is comedy to me."

"You see that this slang expression goes much further back than most men suspect. But the oldest reference of all is to be found in the Bible. If you open to Leviticus, chapter sixteen, verse ten, you will find what is perhaps the original of the whole matter. I refer to the scapegoat or 'emissary goat' as our Catholic version has it. That was the animal on the head of which Aaron, on the great day of atonement, loaded all the sins of the people after which it was driven into the wilderness. Now you see what we mean when we say, 'I'm the goat.' How many realize that they are quoting Scripture when they make that confession of weakness? McCarthy has never yet been anybody's scapegoat."

"There are many more interesting things which I might say on the subject of goats. I might remind you that the ancient Greeks ate goat meat seasoned with assafoetida. Nowadays when I make a man eat humble pie he pulls so many wry faces that one might suspect it had the old Greek seasoning. I might also tell you of the curious chance by which Montaigne discovered that the blood of the goat was not efficacious for the cure of calculus or stone. You will find the story in his essay 'Of the Resemblance of Children to their Fathers.' It shows that somebody got old Montaigne's goat but the wily Frenchman soon got it back again."

"It would be worth while inquiring whether the isle of Capri which, you will remember, is a little south of the Bay of Naples, was so named from its goats, like our own Goat Island, or whether the inhabitants were experts in getting the goats of their enemies. Suetonius tells us that it was Caesar Augustus who first made Capri a fashionable resort—a sort of Newport—and Augustus corraled many goats in his day. If we did not know that Capri was an ancient name we might suspect that it was conferred on the little isle after Tiberius went there. He was of a very goatish disposition, as even Ferrero whose volumes on the grandeur and decay of Rome I have recently read, admits and he delighted in peccata non inter Christianos nominanda—pardon my use of Latin. It is a strange thing, by the way, that none of our reformers who were so busy changing local names ever thought of calling Goat Island Capri. If they had made the suggestion I would have cited to them what that famous Greek—"

But at this moment Secretary Leffingwell informed the mayor that Cleve Dam was on the telephone and I reluctantly departed full of wonder at the mayor's literary attainments. That is to say, I would have so departed if I had had this interview.

As Teddy Goes Banging On

Some Sidelight from the New York Sun on the Prodigy of Garrulity as he Tongued his Way Through the Middle West. Also a Syllabus of His Cheyenne Speech Which May Prove of Interest to Alienists

Mr. Roosevelt clenched his fist, pounded the air and clicked his jaws as he told folks in the various States what he will do whenever he gets power. He said he would keep order and insist upon justice from the rich man. A good many got the impression that T. R. spoke as though he expected to have power in the future, for he used that tense most of the time. His utterances, however, so far as 1912 is concerned, have not more than lightly suggested that he is moving right ahead on his own hook.

The Colonel hasn't got far enough on his trip yet to permit an accurate estimation of his popularity in the West. Of course the crowds yelled and rooted for "Teddy" and said nice things right to the Colonel's face, but they did not go wild. As the train would draw away from the various stations one could catch faint booms for "Our next President," but nothing stronger was forthcoming.

Still, the Colonel liked his job and continued to hammer away at corporations and mobs.

Everywhere there were incidents typical of a Roosevelt tour. When the Colonel would spot a baby in the crowd he would stop in the middle of a sentence to pass a kind word to a pair of fond parents.

At Toledo he switched suddenly, his face grew tense and he harped upon the worn topic of corporations and shouted that he would get the crooks when the time came.

A private porter, Elihu Worthington, who works among the correspondents, awakened Mr. Roosevelt at 5:30 o'clock this morning. The Colonel got right up and the whole party was almost dumped on to the station platform at Buffalo. Motor cars furnished by prominent citizens whirled them all up to the Elliott Club. They found about 300 persons waiting inside. Breakfast was served without a wait and as soon as that was put away Herbert E. Crouch, vice-president, called the meeting to order and introduced Mr. Roosevelt. The time was 6:45 o'clock.

"I always realized that Buffalo was a wide-awake burgh, but I did not think it was possible that so many men would get up at 5 o'clock to meet me. I shall only say that I am exceedingly grateful that I did not get here at 3 o'clock, because I don't know what form of entertainment they would have provided for me then," was the Colonel's introduction.

Mr. Roosevelt went directly to the subject of his address on waterways. He discussed the problems of keeping waterways free from pollution. He said that being a civilized people we ought to have some better way of disposing of our sewage than by putting it in our drink water. He urged the need of State and nation acting to stop this. The Colonel took the theme of pure water supply as an example of our public morals.

Those on the train waited with a good deal of interest for Mr. Roosevelt's initial rear platform speech. As the train rumbled into Dunkirk Secretary Harper, who by the way promises to be the busiest little secretary in existence, and Publisher Howland of the Outlook peered ahead of them with a show of anxiety. The Colonel rushed out to the platform. He shook hands with a few dozen citizens, spoke a few words to the railroad men in the yards and then guessed he'd better be on his way for he had much to do.

"Hey, you T. R.," a fat man with a brown derby yelled. "Go in and whip 'em at the convention!"

"By George, I'll do that!" the Colonel called back, and he went into the car.

At Erie a regular delegation of up-Staters piled on. They called T. R.'s attention to the size of the crowd. A conservative estimate placed it at 6,000. President of the Board of Trade Sturgeon told the Colonel how he had met Lincoln on his way to be inaugurated. One surmised that he was trying to pull over a smile. If the Colonel realized it his looks belied him.

In the middle of his brief address Mr. Roosevelt was interrupted by S. M. Smith, who handed him a small piece of venison he had cured. The Colonel thanked him. Mr. Smith also presented the ex-President with a reproduction of the Ulster County Gazette of January 4, 1800.

The Colonel encountered tonight for the first time an opposition factor. It was at Grand Island. They were having a whooping big Wild West show and the manager, who had been informed that Roosevelt was going to stop, sent him a wire requesting that he keep on going because they did not wish any outside influences to contend with. Everybody in Grand Island wanted to see the show. It was either that or Roosevelt.

For some mysterious reason the message did not reach the Colonel. He did stop and he spoke briefly just at the time the show was scheduled to begin. They had to postpone the opening, and as usual T. R. won out against even a Wild West show.

Mr. Roosevelt talked so frequently and so vigorously in the morning and early afternoon that his voice threatened to go back on him. A huskiness which was noticed yesterday developed into a rather serious throat in Council Bluffs. The Colonel declared that there was nothing much the matter with him and that he will be able to do all that he has planned to do, so there is no alarm at present.

Everybody except Elihu Worthington and George Arbuthnot, two negro porters attached to the special train, was sleeping soundly this morning as the engine rumbled into Marshalltown. Even George Ade, who had lodgings in the car ahead, had not awakened. As the train drew near to the Marshalltown station Elihu stuck his head out of the car window and saw a great crowd packed up to the tracks, heard a band playing "America" and spotted the committee, all in frock coats. This meant that there was something doing.

The alarm was sent up and down the cars and the engineer stopped the train. Mr. Roosevelt was called and told that a telegram had been received saying that Marshalltown felt very much slighted because T. R. wasn't going to stop and say howdy to the Iowans. Now the Colonel isn't the sort to slight anybody when he can help it, so he sent word to the crowd that he would arise and speak. The time was 6:45 a. m. He slipped a raincoat over his blue pajamas, put on his bath slippers, rubbed his eyes, just as he did in Buffalo, and went out to the rear platform. There he faced a population of about 4,000 wide-awake citizens, some of whom had stayed awake all night to be there for the occasion.

Marshalltown didn't get a very long speech. The Colonel started right off by telling them that Iowa is a grand State and that he liked the enthusiasm of its people. He said a word or two about farming, but he checked himself to glare at a rural person who took his picture. That photograph of T. R. in his pajamas and slippers, shielded by a raincoat, will be a trophy. The crowd screamed with delight.

"By George," exclaimed the Colonel laughing, "this is an outrage; an outrage, by George. But what can I do?" Then he waved good-by as the train drew out.

During the festivities at Cheyenne the Colonel spotted a colored trooper. He looked twice and then shouted to him, calling his name. The man answered. He was the soldier to whom Roosevelt gave the orders telling the troops at Santiago to cease firing so that the machine guns might be used. Spectators who caught the incident were amazed that the Colonel should recall such a thing. But he did.

In the old days before the gambling ban was on Cheyenne would have turned itself inside out today, it would have classed with Reno. But the little wheel did not spin and the ivory cubes were not spilled. The Colonel walked in the street, shook hands with those who desired to shake, and enjoyed the proceedings just as he enjoys anything that is rugged and free. He saw the Sioux and the Cheyenne Indians who are left pass by the reviewing stand, and as they did he turned to Gov. Brooks and exclaimed that years ago he stood off a band of them all by himself. Like Custer, he too fought the Sioux.

Following is a syllabus of the Colonel's Cheyenne speech:

I reached, I accepted, I was glad, I have a peculiar feeling, I lived, I count, I am tempted, I am now addressing, I myself saw, I have seen the herds.

I have seen the fortunate movement, I now travel, I first rode, I find cities, I have used the word, I greet you, I stand for progress.

I do not mean, I would preach fiery wrath, I would not preach such wrath, I wish to say a word, I speak, I thought, I wish, I hold.

My hunting trip, my neighbors, my end of the country, my life, my own regiment, me.

The Needy Descendants of Genius

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: As the Dickens centenary approaches there is increasing call for the organization of some popular scheme by means of which the grandchildren of the dead author may be made independent of the necessity of earning their own livelihood. The arguments brought forward are the same old, shop-worn and shelf-marked assertions that these descendants, of the third generation, all of adult years and sound in mind and body, have an inalienable claim against the public, and more particularly against the American public, because in the days when Charles Dickens was producing his novels there was no International Copyright Law to protect him against piracy. Each and every one of us who has read the Dickens novels is now accused of being an accessory to the crime of highway robbery and exhorted to make restitution forthwith or be anathema forever. It does not appear that any of the Dickens descendants is in actual want nor is there any reason, even if that were the fact, why they should be entitled to public relief as a reward for having had an exceptionally gifted grandparent. Perhaps it is their misfortune to have inherited more of the Micawber-like qualities of their ancestor four times removed than of the energy and capacity of his son, but perhaps again, had the elder Dickens been more industrious and persistent Charles Dickens himself, lacking the spur of necessity, would have failed to develop his natural abilities. Despite the socialistic theory, the fact remains that people will not labor for what they can obtain without. There is probably just as much latent capacity amongst our gilded youths of today as there was in their ancestors who, by accumulating fortunes, rendered it unnecessary for them to exert themselves, and in consequence, the force which might have gone towards the development of business is diverted to sport and mischief. If the Dickensses of the third generation have abilities, nothing stands in the way of their exercising them. They are not prohibited from writing, painting or even carpentering and ditch-digging, if they know how and are not deterred by pride. While it is true that authors and artists seldom leave fortunes for their descendants it is also true that though they may earn large sums by the exercise of their talents, they also spend largely, and there is no exemption from the laws of Nature for them more than for other people. They cannot keep their cakes and eat them at the same time, and they must choose between saving and spending precisely as a costermonger must. It sounds well to regret that the children of authors have profited little if anything, by the genius of their parents, but as a matter of plain fact, even if copyright laws had been included amongst the commandments, authors who are notoriously improvident, would, in all likelihood, have disposed of their future profits for a sum in hand, and the perpetuation of the rights would result not in relieving the necessities of the impecunious who happen to have had literary ancestry but in the enrichment of the publishers. It is vastly easier to keep hold of tangible property than to tether a will o' the wisp, but we need only look about us in this comparatively new city of San Francisco and State of California, and ask what of the offspring of the magnates of fifty and sixty years ago? How many of the grandchildren of those who staked claims in the rich "diggings" have any interest in the mines of today? How many still own the original homestead or any land at all? What of the China and India traders who made Boston and Salem famous a century ago? Comparatively few investors have profited by the work of their brains, much less to the extent of leaving their families independent forever. In nearly every case they have been coolly swindled by some capitalist, who, in a strictly legal way has stripped them of every right. No one knows, or even cares whether they and their children suffer want in consequence. It has come to be the expected thing, in this twentieth century, that when a man has chosen to earn a livelihood by means of any of the arts, it entitles his descendants in the remotest degree of kindred, to set up a claim for public support on the ground of relationship, independent of any merit of their own, and while thus soliciting public charity, to be exempted from the stigma of beggary. A decent pride in their ancestry should dictate just the opposite course.

The Bend Sinister

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: It amuses me to learn from Town Talk that a writer in Munsey's has been trying to disprove the story that Martin Van Buren, eighth President of the United States, was the natural son of Aaron Burr. Why not let the descendants of Van Buren have the benefit of the doubt? Who would not rather have Burr than Van Buren blood in his veins? The circumstance of its having been derived in an unconventional way is of no importance. Some of the greatest men that ever lived were illegitimate children. One of the greatest men of the bend sinister was Erasmus, head of the republic of letters of the 16th century. Nearly all the first Medici had natural children whose careers were invariably brilliant. Balzac tells us, and I suppose his authority is creditable, that Cardinal Giulio de Medici, afterwards Pope under the name of Clement VII was the illegitimate son of Giuliano I. Cardinal Ippolito de Medici was also a natural son and came very near being pope and the head of the family. Margaret, the famous daughter of Charles II, was illegitimate. The sixteenth century which was crammed with talent, enterprise, poesy, wealth and gallantry was the golden age for bastards. And never was there in any land, in any sovereign family, a greater contempt for legitimacy than in the famous house of the Medici.

Doctoring Despatches

Editor Town Talk: The Call of late has become so ardent an idolizer of Mr. Roosevelt that it even doctors its despatches when they do not always depict him as a demi-god. For example, in the Associated Press despatches dated August 31, the scene at Osawatimie, Kansas, was thus described:

On the green, just outside the grove, were rows of booths in which were sandwich men and side shows. The scene was like that at a county fair, and while the Colonel was speaking thousands of people who could not get close enough to him to see him wandered along the lanes between the booths, taking in the sights.

The vendors of wares did not decrease their shouts while the Colonel was speaking, and he had to compete for a hearing with the whistle of the merry-go-round, the "squawkers" that the children had and the strident voices of the Kansas orators who were urging the people to buy peanuts, popcorn, "hot dogs," pink lemonade and potato peelers.

The Call evidently feared that its readers— from perusing this account of the Colonel outbawling the spielers of frankfurter—might cease to look upon him with the dog-like adoration of its editors. So that passage was cut out, although it appeared in the other journals. On the same day a European cablegram told how George Ledebour, a member of the German Reichstag, bitterly attacked Roosevelt for his imperialistic ideas, the despatch closing with this paragraph:

Among other things Herr Ledebour said: "He has forgotten that he represents a democratic nation whose existence was due to a revolution. Shame on him, for joining the British rulers against Egyptian patriots."

This paragraph also the Call cut out, although it was printed by the other papers. The Call must look upon Roosevelt's prestige as an evanescent thing, and to safeguard it his henchmen are forced to garble the news.

The Red Key

By Maurice Le Blanc (From the French)

Oh, hatred! Once in my life I saw it close at hand, the real kind that is silent, waiting for years to satiate itself, and then enjoying without remorse the dreadful revenges it elaborates.

All my childhood is associated with the remembrance of two comrades, Hubert de Pleucadine and Rodolphe d'Arvan. We studied together, we passed our examinations at Paris together. We had no secrets from one another, and I loved the pale, sickly Hubert as much as the strong and vigorous Rodolphe.

Then we drifted apart. They went back to their own country, down in Morbihan. Our letters, at first frequent, gradually ceased, and I heard no more of them.

Last year, in the course of a tour in Brittany, I saw them again. They were living in two neighboring houses along the Lauvaux moor, two old houses surrounded by high walls and deep trenches. Each one lived alone, but every day they met for supper at one or the other house, and passed their evenings together.

We dined at Hubert's house, in a high-ceilinged room with a large fireplace. We ate and drank, and talked of many things. At dessert I said:

"Let me see, Hubert; some years ago I read an announcement of the marriage of a Pleucadine. Was it you?"

There was a dead silence. Hubert sat with his elbows upon the table, his thin, white face between his fists. Then he smiled coldly and his voice was almost indifferent, although I noticed a slight tremor in it, as he answered me:

"It was I. I loved only once in my life, and she whom I loved consented to marry me. We were very happy, Edith and I. You remember, Rodolphe, how happy we were? She was so beautiful, and I loved her so much! She, too, loved me greatly, at first, with a simple, ingenuous affection.

"Now listen. I was forced to be absent from home for six months; and when I returned she took me aside, and these are the strange words she spoke:

"Hubert, I no longer love you."

"She said this quietly, looking into my eyes, and she added, without any pity: 'I love another man, to whom I belong—another man, you understand, who is my lover.'

"Was she insane? Her appearance was somewhat disquieting; her voice was strange, and I felt that she was speaking, in spite of herself, under the sway of some inward and all-powerful force. I wanted to kill her; then I burst into tears, and I did not really believe that it was true; no, I could not believe it. But she took my hands from my face, and said harshly:

"This is no time to weep. We must consider what we are to do. I quite understand your

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over.

Roosevelt and the New York Post

The Evening Post of New York recently printed an editorial entitled "Modest Mr. Roosevelt" in which it referred to his "disgusting humbug" and called him "a man who talks big but acts mean," "a roarer for political virtue" and "a peculiarly repellant combination of demagogue and dictator." It charged him with "moral impudence," characterized his present activity as "indecent and dangerous" and declared that he took Harriman's money "to buy votes in New York." Roosevelt retorted in the Outlook by saying that "in a movement designed to put an end to the dominion of the thief but little good can be derived from the assistance of the liar." He spoke of the statement regarding his relations with Harriman as "the foulest and the basest lie." In reply to this the Evening Post declared that it was an honor to be "thought worthy of receiving the Order of Merit which Mr. Roosevelt has bestowed on so many distinguished citizens." To refute Roosevelt's representations as to the Harriman incident the Post reprinted the correspondence which passed between the then President and the railroad baron. It also published a number of letters from private individuals congratulating the paper on its stand. This constitutes the most noteworthy newspaper controversy in which the Colonel has engaged since his return from Africa.

An Embargo on Caviare

Owing to the spread of cholera in Russia Turkey has forbidden the importation of Russian caviare, which is as great a delicacy for the Turks as it is for the Americans, although not so expensive. The Russian Medical Council promptly reported after hearing of the Turkish embargo that caviare is perfectly safe and not a vehicle for carrying the cholera germ because no water is used in its preparation. The council rather naively added that only boracic acid, salicylic acid and other preservatives were used by caviare packers. It seems that the council thinks that these preservatives are liked by consumers of caviare throughout the world.

Cable Line on Fujiyama

The summit of Fujiyama, Japan's holy mountain, is to be made more easily accessible to the 20,000 pilgrims who every year make a laborious ascent on foot. The Japanese delegates who attended the International Railroad Congress at Berne after making a thorough examination of the various systems of Swiss mountain railways have come to the conclusion that the suspension cable car system which is operated on the Niesen Mountain in the Bernese Oberland is best suited to the Japanese requirements. The building of the new Fujiyama line is to be entrusted to Swiss engineering firms.

Social Reform in Germany

A movement for the reform of certain social usages is on foot in Germany. The reformers say that German manners are far too formal and ostentatious. They object particularly to the customary method of exchanging salutations on the street. According to the unwritten law of the land two German gentlemen who are acquainted greet each other by removing the hat with a sweeping ceremonious gesture. The reformers are pledged to greet their men friends by simply touching the rim of the hat in a sort of military salute. How much opposition the reformers will have to overcome if they are to be successful is shown by the case of an official of the Finance Ministry of Hesse-Darmstadt. As a loyal member of the reformers' society he declined to greet his superior official, the Finance Minister, in the customary fashion and used the more democratic "German greeting" adopted by his fellow reformers. Although the society numbers 1,000 members in Darmstadt and the Grand Duke himself views its work with favor, the official was found guilty of disrespect to his superiors and fined 20 marks. A large part of the German press seems to regard the innovation with favor and it is not improbable that in the near future there will be a simplification of German manners.

Japan's Trade Ambition

Japan does not wish to be outdone by the United States and the European powers in the competition for trade with the more prosperous of the South American republics. In Tokio a Latin American association has been organized to assist the Government in its policy to push Japanese commercial interests, mainly in Peru, Chile, Argentina and Brazil, by an army of specially appointed officials. The chief imports to Japan from these countries are nitre, wheat, corn, leather and animal hair, and in return Japan exports bamboo ware, silk fabrics, sulphur and porcelain. The task of these Japanese commercial agents is to see that these goods pass to and from Japan without the employment of Chinese, French and German middlemen. The result is that Japanese shipping companies are doing a good business. It is Japan's intention also to secure a share in the development of the agricultural and mineral riches of South America. The Government is vigorously backing the various Japanese emigration companies in their efforts to introduce Japanese labor in the sugar and coffee plantations.

The Sister of the Baroness

By Katherine Mansfield

"There are two new guests arriving this afternoon," said the manager of the pension, placing a chair for me at the breakfast table. "I have only received the letter acquainting me of the fact this morning. The Baroness von Gall is sending her little daughter—the poor child is dumb—to make the 'cure.' She is to stay with us a month, and then the Baroness herself is coming."

"Baroness von Gall," cried the Frau Doktor coming into the room, and from her expression positively scenting the name. "Coming here? There was a picture of her only last week in 'Sport and Salon.' She is a friend of the Court: I have heard that the Kaiserin says 'du' to her. But this is delightful! I shall take my doctor's advice and spend an extra six weeks here. There is nothing like young society."

"But the child is dumb," ventured the manager apologetically.

"Bah! What does that matter? Afflicted children have such pretty ways."

Each guest who came into the breakfast room was bombarded with the wonderful news.

"The Baroness von Gall is sending her little daughter here. The Baroness herself is coming in a month's time."

Coffee and rolls took on the nature of an orgy. We positively scintillated. Anecdotes of the High Born were poured out, sweetened and sipped. We gorged on scandals of High Birth generously buttered.

"They are to have the room next to yours," said the manager, addressing me. "I was wondering if you would permit me to take down the portrait of the Kaiserin Elizabeth from above your bed to hang over their sofa."

"Yes, indeed. Something home-like." The Frau Oberregierungsrat patted my hand. "And of no possible significance to you."

I felt a little crushed. Not at the prospect of losing that vision of diamonds and blue velvet bust, but at the tone—placing one outside the pale—branding me as a foreigner.

We dissipated the day in valid speculations. Decided it was too warm to walk in the afternoon, so lay down in our beds, mustering in great force for afternoon coffee. And a carriage drove up to the door. A tall young girl got out leading a child by the hand. They entered the hall, were greeted and shown to their room. Ten minutes later she came down with the child to sign the visitor's book. She wore a black, closely fitting dress, touched at throat and wrists with white frilling. Her brown hair, braided, was tied with a black bow—unusually pale, with a small mole on her left cheek.

"I am the Baroness von Gall's sister," she said, trying the pen on a piece of blotting paper, and smiling at us deprecatingly. Even for the most jaded of us life holds its thrilling moments. Two Baronesses in two months! The manager immediately left the room to find a new nib.

To my plebeian eyes that afflicted child was singularly unattractive. She had the air of having been perpetually washed with a blue bag, and hair like grey wool. Dressed, too, in a pinafore so stiffly starched that she could only peer at us over the frill of it—a social barrier of a pinafore—and perhaps it was too much to expect a noble aunt to attend to the menial consideration of her niece's ears. But a dumb niece with unwashed ears struck me as a most depressing object.

They were given places at the head of the table. For a moment we all looked at one another with an eena-deena-dina-do expression, then the Frau Oberregierungsrat:—

"I hope you are not tired after your journey."

"No," said the sister of the Baroness, smiling into her cup.

"I hope the dear child is not tired," said the Frau Doktor.

"Not at all."

"I expect, I hope you will sleep well tonight," the Her Oberlehrer said reverently.

"Yes."

The poet from Munich never took his eyes off the pair. He allowed his tie to absorb most of his coffee while he gazed at them exceedingly soulfully.

Unyoking Pegasus, thought I. Death spasms of his Odes to Solitude! There were possibilities in that young woman for an inspiration, not to mention a dedication, and from that moment his suffering temperament took up its bed and walked.

They retired after the meal, leaving us to discuss them at leisure.

"There is a likeness," mused the Frau Doktor.

My Day of Life

By Ambrose Bierce

I know not how it is—it seems Fantastic and surprising
That after all these dreams and dreams,
Here in the sun's first level beams,
The sun is still just rising!

When first he showed his sovereign face,
And bade the night-folk scuttle
Back to their holes, I took my place
Here on the hill, and God His grace
Sent slumber soft and subtle.

Among the poppies red and white,
I've lain and drowsed, for all it Appears a sluggardly delight.
I must have had a wakeful night,
Though, faith, I don't recall it.

And, O I've dreamed so many things!
One hardly can unravel
The tangled web of visionings
That slumber-of-the-morning brings:
Play, study, work and travel;

The love of women (mostly those Were fairest that were newest);
Hard knocks from friends and other foes:
Compacts with men (my memory shows
The dearest are the truest);

War—what a hero I became
By merely dreaming battle!
Athwart the field of letters, Fame
Blared through the brass my weary name
With an ominous death-rattle.

Such an eternity of thought
Within a minute's fraction!
Such phantoms out of nothing wrought,
And fading suddenly to naught
As I awake to action!

They scamper each into its hole,
These dreams of my begetting.
They've had their moment; take, my soul,
Thy day of life. . . . Gods! this is droll—
That thieving sun is "setting"!

Oakland, September 3.

The Spectator

Ambrose Bierce

Compact with much of the philosophy of life are the verses printed above. "We never live; we are always in the expectation of living," said Voltaire. "We never live, but we ever hope to live," said Pascal. And now comes the Dean of American letters, Ambrose Bierce—in the fullness of his years back he comes to his old haunts, where it was his pleasure to offer victims at the shrine of universal mirth and exercise his incomparable powers against knaves and fools, and this testimony he gives: "The sun is still just rising." But if Bierce has only now awakened to action, his genius certainly has had many a wakeful night among the poppies, else how should we account for the immortality of the innumerable black beetles and other folks in translucent amber and ambrosian epigram. It has been observed by wise critics that Bierce wasted his satire on persons of no importance, on mediocrities unknown beyond the confines of the parish. But there can be no stronger proof of his genius than that he can be read with delight by persons wholly unacquainted with the objects of his scorn and derision. Some satirists have perpetuated the memory of the great. Bierce has immortalized nonentities. And now though a publisher is about to bring out an edition de luxe of his works, and though the author is still in the land of the living, first editions of his books command high premiums. A few months ago a copy of his "Shapes of Clay" sold for twenty dollars. Since then a book-seller came upon ten copies of the work in a second-hand furniture store, and he got them cheap, the owner having no conception of their value. The book-seller put down the price to fifteen dollars a volume and he got it. So the weary name is no longer blared with "an ominous death-rattle."

The Origin of the "Jumping Frog"

Andrew Lang is a great literary man, a writer on multifarious subjects and a scholar of surpassing erudition, but he is deficient in the sense of humor. Perhaps his Scottish birth has something to do with the matter. In one of his recent newspaper articles Lang had occasion to mention Mark Twain's story of the "Jumping Frog of Calaveras County" and he recalls Twain's statement that the story was of Greek origin. Of course everybody except Lang knows that when Twain traced the Smiley yarn back to the Greek he was indulging in a bit of characteristic pleasantry, but Lang finds that there is "nothing absolutely incredible" in the statement! He goes into it at length with imperturbable gravity and finally mentions the probability of Twain making the claim in fun! He actually "doubts" Mark's belief that the yarn was of ancient Greek extraction! Thus does the savant play at cross-purposes with the humorist. If Twain were only alive his reply to Andrew Lang would be worth reading. By the way, how many people know the actual origin of the frog story? The man who first chronicled it was Sam Sebaugh, one of the best of the early day editorial writers of this State. At one time he was a shining light of the Chronicle editorial staff. While employed as an editorial writer by the Stockton Mail he left his sanctum one hot night and ordered a cool drink in the saloon which at that time was under the Mail office. While standing at the bar he witnessed the frog contest and on returning to work wrote a straightaway "news story" about it. Twain read the story in the Mail, appropriated it and gave it immortal form.

A Letter from Matias

I have just received a characteristic letter from Matias, our famous Mexican restaurateur. Matias is in Europe. There are several reasons why Matias should be traveling at this time. In the first place he had the misfortune to lose his dearly-beloved wife Rosa not long ago and he seeks surcease of sorrow in foreign scenes. In the second place Matias is as confirmed a traveler as he is a true Bohemian. Every few years he must set forth to note how other nations live. The wander-lust is in his veins. There are two other reasons for his present journey which he sets forth in his letter, and as Matias is as racy as Walpole in his letter-writing I will simply quote what he says: "I am about two thousand nautical miles far from United States. Go to Europe again, but this time I did not close my business cause it cost too much and times are kind close. Yes, Matias, Mexican restaurant man, is again going abroad to see his sick mother in Vienna, Austria, where she is having operation performed for a cataract in her optic. That is one reason I went to Europe. The second is much valuable for my business. I am going like rest of the parvenus from America, to acquire a title. If I cannot get it for nothing then I'll buy it. I want to style myself Don Matias, Count of Tamales y Enchiladas y Chile con Carne, etc., etc., etc. I think those three are enough for this trip. Afterwards we'll add more as more money comes along."

It Caused a Sensation

The news that the affections of the Rev. C. R. Brown have been alienated from his Oakland flock and that the fashionable preacher has his ear to the ground in expectation of a Macedonian cry from New England, has caused quite a flurry in church circles across the bay. Some of the members of the First Congregational Church were startled almost out of their seven senses when they read their Town Talk last week and learned for the first time that their charming minister had been seized with an impulse to transfer his spiritual uplift from Oakland to Harvard. Many were incredulous. But some there were who claimed to have an inkling. Singularly enough the trustees of the church were more astonished at the news than all others. For Dr. Brown had not taken them into his confidence. The truth is he was not prepared to do so, not yet having received the call from Harvard. So of course the publication of the news was somewhat premature from Dr. Brown's standpoint, and perhaps it is to be regretted that it was not withheld, for coming as a surprise it incited speculation, conjecture, rumor, tittle-tattle and all that sort of thing, which is not at all desirable among nice people who attend church and love their neighbors as themselves. It is one of the misfortunes of editors in their eagerness to publish the news before it ceases to be that they inadvertently cause unpleasantness.

Phelan's Dilemma

Let us commiserate our dear friend and benefactor, the Hon. James Duval Phelan. He wants to come back to us, but a perplexing situation confronts him and gives him pause. Here we are in the midst of a State campaign with Hiram Johnson, puppet of the Spreckels-Phelan cabal running for Governor on the Republican ticket against Theodore Bell, the standard bearer of the Democracy which may some day land Jimmy at the goal of his ambition provided he remain true to the faith. An ass may preserve his neutrality between two bales of hay, but between Johnson and Bell it will never do for Jimmy to hold his peace. The only solution to the problem is absence from the State. From one of Mr. Phelan's friends I have learned that if Johnson had been defeated at the primary the young millionaire would have appeared on the scene before the end of September and plunged heartily into the fray. He would have supported Bell with heart and purse. But the election of Johnson compelled a change of program. Now it is authoritatively stated that he will return in October; but that he will be unavoidably delayed until November is pronounced by his most intimate acquaintances as the one best bet of the season.

Langdon Out for Johnson and a Job

If Mr. Johnson cannot have the active support of the Hon. James D. Phelan there is compensation for him in the loyalty of the Hon. "Bill" Langdon who is happily unfettered by political principle. With a job in sight Bill is never squeamish. He has a long nose for the pie wagon and an abhorrence for punctilio. Whenever the opportunity to plant both feet in the trough presents itself Bill is scornful of ceremony. Bill is always conscious of the identity of his own and the public good, and with impartial zeal he devotes his best efforts to their simultaneous advancement. In the halcyon days of his young manhood Bill was a practical Democrat and as such became Superintendent of Schools. When organized labor entered the political field, and gave promise of rewarding men of talent Bill espoused the cause and became District Attorney. When the Independence League began peddling nominations Bill put in a prompt appearance and loomed up as a candidate for Governor. Now he is supporting the Republican candidate, and has agreed to stump the State for reform and Johnson with the understanding, I am told, that he be recognized as eminently fitted for the job of Superintendent of Banks at ten thousand a year. Bill, it will be remembered, married into a bank some time ago, and he is now one of our most distinguished rural financiers. Toward the end of his term in the District Attorney's office he made public the important announcement that he intended to resume the practice of law. How he could "resume" what he had never begun was a puzzle to his friends until later they realized that it was a bit of humor. Instead of going into the practice of law he entered a country bank and prepared himself for the job that Hiram expects to have at his disposal.

When Patriots Fall Out

Mr. Johnson is assured of the loyalty of several of the patriots with whom he was formerly associated as a private prosecutor for both revenue and glory. Among them is Al. McCabe, one of Langdon's subordinates, a Democrat who has long served both his party and the people. Of Mr. Johnson's old associates the only ones who do not seem conscious of the importance of putting him on guard at Sacramento are the Hon. Francis J. Heney and that pink-cheek apostle of freedom the good and beautiful Professor Boke. They are maintaining an attitude of aloofness, not however from the same motives. Boke is disgruntled because Heney was not the choice of the sanhedrin for Governor. No congratulatory message has Johnson ever received from Boke. As to Heney the truth is that when Johnson made his compact with the patriots who are running him for Governor it was expressly stipulated that Francis J. should be required to yield the centre of the stage. It appears that Johnson had reached the conclusion that the perfervid one had glory enough. Besides their relations were no longer as cordial as formerly. This is no secret.

Johnson has taken many people into his confidence with regard to the squabbles among the anointed ones of the somewhat disintegrated graft cabal. And nowadays echoes of dissension that were long confined are penetrating the outer world. From these we learn that even Judge Lawlor has not been able to command the love of all his associates. Matt Sullivan, it is currently reported, is not for the little judge in this campaign, and Hiram Johnson is credited with having served notice on the Older-Spreckels press bureau that he will kick over the traces if Lawlor is permitted to exploit himself to such degree as to divert attention from the gubernatorial contest.

A Few Hints to Commonwealthers

It may be worth the while of the members of the Commonwealth Club who are intent on reforming the penal code to consider the action that was taken against the Daily Chronicle of London for discussing the Crippen case. For the members of this club affect to be very much in favor of the English system of justice. They are in favor of everything that makes it easier to procure the conviction of persons accused of crime, but they take no thought of the means by which old-fashioned Anglo-Saxon justice protects the individual from passion and prejudice. It has not occurred to them that the newspaper plays an important part in the administration of injustice. So while they are eager to reform the code they have no inclination to reform the tyrannical press. I suspect the members of the Commonwealth Club of moral cowardice; though of course their attitude may be due to inability to realize that our despotic journalists are more to be dreaded than ordinary assassins and grafters. The commonwealthers like other reformers give reign to their zeal without first fully ascertaining whether they may not be running amuck. The principal innovations they propose are designed to increase the discretion and powers of the trial judges, to give them the same latitude that trial judges have in England. Apparently they are unaware of the fact that English judges are men who have been educated in the law and trained at the bar. It would be utterly impossible for men of the Lawlor and Dunne type, uneducated men who never had a client, to get on the bench in England. It is comparatively safe to give an English judge a great range of discretionary power, because as he is not beholden to the mob he is not likely to appeal to popular favor. There is no incentive in England to the making of "a record for convictions," such a record as Judge Lawlor has pointed to with pride. And there being no such incentive there is consequently no likelihood that a judge will keep tab on jurors for the purpose of excluding from the box men who have voted for acquittal in three cases out of five. If the commonwealthers will take the trouble to inquire they will learn that such is Judge Lawlor's practice, and they will learn that because it is known that such is his practice wise attorneys for the defense when examining talesmen inquire as to how often they have served in Judge Lawlor's court. If they have served often it is considered conclusive that they are inclined to conciliate his Honor by voting for conviction, and then comes the task of getting rid of them. If the commonwealthers will familiarize themselves with all the tricks of the trade which they wish to reform perhaps the result may be that limitation instead of increase of power is what they will demand.

Steinway Pianola Piano at Kohler & Chase

¶ The Steinway Pianola Piano is a combination of the Steinway Upright and the Pianola. The makers of the Steinway Piano looked far and wide for the best player in the world to be linked with the Steinway Piano—it is the Pianola that has been chosen. You should follow this distinguished example when you come to buy a player-piano. Be sure that you get the genuine Pianola. Do not be satisfied with any weak substitute. Please remember that Pianola Piano is a name for a certain kind of player-piano and is not a name for all player-pianos. Remember that there are 300 features in the Pianola Piano, which are not to be found in any other player-piano.

The Latest Bunko Game

Quite a number of well known men about town, some of them married and some of them single, have been taken in by the very latest scheme of the card sharps. The peculiarity of this latest method of fleecing the easy mark is that it is frequently quite successful when the victims know that they are being victimized. Its safety lies in the fact that the married men do not dare to expose it while the bachelors as a rule are too crestfallen to admit in public that they have been duped. The scheme is engineered by two very fascinating young women known about town by the dubious designation of "good fellows." Their acquaintance is wide and no suspicion is aroused when one of their masculine friends receives a telephone message to accept the hospitality of their apartments in a smart apartment house. "Run up tonight and enjoy a little music and bring a friend or two with you" is the cordial wording of the invitation. When the invited guests arrive they find that there is to be no music but there is plenty of liquid refreshment and there is a prepossessing young man who makes himself very agreeable in conversation. The young women guide the talk to the subject of cards and after a little while a deck is produced and a little harmless casino indulged in. Then poker is mentioned and it is all over but the "trimming" which is done by the prepossessing young man who of course is a card sharper. A number of well known men have lost a good deal of money in this manner within the past few weeks. Some of them realized the swindle when the poker game started but forbore a scene out of consideration for the young women. One or two quietly withdrew without playing. None is willing to talk about the bunko game for publication. "What would my wife say?" ask the married men. "The boys at the club would guy me unmercifully," say the bachelors. So there you are.

Charlie Hanlon "Sold"

From the current leaves of the Green Book I learn that Charlie Hanlon, the local lawyer, is a close friend of Freddie Ziegfeld whose chief claim to fame consists in the fact that Anna Held is repeatedly represented as about to divorce him. I also learn that Freddie is very fond of playing practical jokes on Charlie, as witness the following: Hanlon went to Ziegfeld in New York recently, told him that he was about to cross the Atlantic for the first time and asked for a few pointers on the proper apparel for ocean travel. "Smart walking suit for the morning promenade and evening clothes at dinner," explained Ziegfeld. "One rule you must be sure to observe—wear a frock coat and silk hat in the afternoon. That's essential. In the afternoon, you know, there is always tea on deck, and that sort of thing, and the same rules apply as for an afternoon reception at home." The first day out Charlie was sick and didn't appear on deck. But on the second afternoon he burst upon the startled promenade deck in trousers of a light gray stripe, a frock coat of faultless cut and the shiniest of shiny silk ties. A titter ran round the deck but Charlie was only conscious that the rest of the men were sartorially deficient. "Yokels," he muttered. After two days of this sort of thing Hanlon grew confidential with a college chap and asked him why the other masculine passengers were not properly accoutered. The young college chap set him right. "I've wanted to tip you off all the time," he said, "but I decided you were doing it on a bet." All who believe this story will kindly hold up their hands so that teacher may count them.

Wilson Mizner, Champion of Virtue

The exuberant and versatile Wilson of the House of Mizner will soon add to the gayety of nations by appearing in the role of the stern moralist. In his time Wilson Mizner has played many parts but this will be the most fantastic of them all. Mizner is going to elevate the stage. A difficult undertaking indeed, but never yet has a Mizner hesitated before a task because it proved difficult. Mizner has already fleshed his maiden pen in drama and he will soon be ready to startle the world of stagemod with another attempt. The new play will be called "Deep Purple" and will be constructed to match its name. Writing to a friend in this city Wilson Mizner revealed his purpose of adopting the role of a champion of virtue in these words: "When my other play, 'The Only Law,' was produced, the critics jumped all over it because virtue did not triumph in the last act. Well, they will not be able to jump all over my next play because I am going to make virtue triumph with a vengeance."

The Accuracy of Hubbard

More than once before in these columns I have called attention to the inaccuracies with which Elbert Hubbard seasons his daily portions of predigested philosophy. An article published in the Examiner last week under the caption of "The Disagreeable Girl" contained a few that were characteristic. Having occasion several times to speak of the heroine of "The Doll's House" he invariably calls her Nora Hebler instead of Nora Tesman. He also says that Shaw can no more write a play and leave out the disagreeable girl than Turner could paint a picture and leave man out, or Paul Veronese produce a canvas and omit the dog. Is it necessary to mention that many of Turner's greatest paintings have no human beings in them or that Paul Veronese was not nearly as partial to dogs as Hubbard imagines? Or is it necessary to name the Shaw plays which do not contain disagreeable girls? What is the use of correcting the wiseacre of East Aurora?

The Law of the Yukon

Billy Dohrman, once an Alaska goldhunter but now vice-president of the Swedish-American Bank, glanced through a letter and handed it to a friend who was sitting with him in the lobby of one of the big hotels. It was written from a northern penitentiary by an unfortunate convict who explained that he was anxious to sell

BON VOYAGE BOXES

For your friends starting on a journey, the sentiment of Bon Voyage (pleasant voyage) is correctly expressed by one of Geo. Haas & Sons' appropriately decorated Bon Voyage boxes filled with candies. a fancy bridle which he had woven and appealed to Dohrman for assistance because he had met him in Alaska. The friend remarked that such letters were quite common. "I know they are," answered Dohrman, "but this letter is a little different from the rest and I am going to help this poor fellow if I can. Do you notice that he says that he was in Alaska for five years? That may seem a commonplace statement to you, but then you do not know Alaska. That statement, if true, means that that fellow is entitled to my help. All the men who stay in Alaska for five years constitute a brotherhood and there is a sort of masonry among them. The reason is that you can't stay in Alaska for five years unless you are on the square. If you do anything that is crooked Alaska becomes too hot for you and that's no paradox. If this man has been in Alaska for five years it is not likely that he deserves to be in jail. You notice he says he is innocent. I am inclined to believe him and I am going to find out. If he weathered five years of the north he is not likely to have committed a crime since." All of which I had never known before. I wonder how many local men who went to Alaska had to leave before five years had passed?

Doc Taylor's Counterfeit Presentment

A prominent clubman whose name does not matter in this connection was standing with some friends in front of the St. Francis bar. Of a sudden his gaze became fixed and there was a look of lively interest on his face. The topic of conversation was politics so his companions were taken aback when he interrupted with the irrelevant question: "Wasn't it Michelangelo who introduced his enemies into his pictures in the guise of devils?" "What the deuce has that got to do with the governorship?" demanded one of his companions. "Nothing whatever," admitted the clubman, "but this is more interesting than politics. Was it Michelangelo?" "No, it wasn't Michelangelo," retorted the art sharp of the gathering. "I think it was Raphael. What about it?" "Gentlemen," said the clubman in his most impressive manner, "we have the counterpart of Raphael or Michelangelo, whichever it was, in this city. To ascertain his identity we have only to find out who modelled that"—and he pointed to a gilded image of Terminus that ornamented the big mirror of the backbar. "That man must have been an enemy of the late reform administration for he has perpetuated in that Bacchic figure the well-known features of ex-mayor Taylor." And sure enough they all noted a wonderful resemblance. It might have been the worthy doctor who was supporting the basket of grapes and quinces—or lemons, maybe—and smiling at the consumers of strong drink. But they agreed that the artist couldn't have put the doctor over the bar for political spite as the work of art antedates Taylor's administration. "Perhaps the doctor plucked the sculptor at law college or the medical school," suggested one. "Or maybe he read some of the doctor's poems and wanted to get even," offered another. There were other theories but why rehearse them? The matter is one of speculative interest only.

"Only one compositor can read my writing," declared the great author; "and sometimes even he can't read it."

"What does he do then?"

"Takes it to the nearest druggist."

The San Franciscans in Paris

With the return of a number of San Franciscans who have been touring Europe, stories about the rendezvous on the Fourth of July in Henry's celebrated bar in the Rue Daunou are beginning to get about. It must have been a great occasion. All the San Franciscans in Paris gathered in the famous cocktail emporium with patriotism on their lips and revelry in their hearts. It was a lengthy sitting and both the patriotism and the revelry were given free expression. First there were cocktails—an American always feels it incumbent upon him to drink plenty of cocktails in Europe—and then there were vintage wines. Ned Greenway was one of the leaders of the merriment, lending unusual eclat to the affair. In the course of the evening one of a little knot of Frenchmen, who had been watching the celebration, came forward, and after begging everybody's pardon for intruding asked leave to say a few words appropriate to the natal day of America. Permission was enthusiastically accorded and the Frenchmen soon had the United States and France locked in an embrace of friendship. He scattered the flowers of his oratory all over our treasured institutions and brought his speech to a fitting close by requesting permission to place a case of wine at the disposal of the Americans. If the speech made a hit, this request made a sensation and was enthusiastically granted. So the wine was opened and poured in toast to American liberty. Then Dr. John Dunn, who speaks French fluently, was delegated to reply on behalf of the United States. They say the doctor made a wonderful speech. He said as many pretty things about July 14 as the Frenchmen had said about July 4. He demolished the Bastille in polished periods and ended his speech with the same proposition which had been advanced by the French orator. So another case of champagne was produced and the merriment went on in a spirit of international amity which excelled anything that Henry's bar had ever seen before. I have been told that Ned Greenway tried to make a speech in French but I have my doubts as to the accuracy of this statement.

They Frightened the Soldiers

During their stay in Paris, Dr. John Dunn, Paul Verdier, Gus Isen and Conrad Peters dined one day on the terrace at Fontainebleau. At an adjoining table sat three non-commissioned officers of the French army. As the shades of evening fell and the influence of the good cheer which they had absorbed began to assert itself the conversation of the three soldiers took on a most bloody tinge. With martial gestures and flashing eyes they confessed to one another just how many men they had killed at the stern call of duty. To hear them tell their tales of carnage would strike terror to the hearts of many men, but the San Franciscans were of a sceptical turn of mind. This was particularly true of Conrad Peters and when they arose from their table and started along the terrace he stole softly behind them in the dusk until he came to a fountain at a bend in the path. Then dipping his hands in the cold water he uttered an unearthly yell and dashed the water on the necks of the bloody warriors. Two of them screamed and ran for dear life without turning to face the danger and the third fell flat in the gravel. Peters and his friends continued their unearthly howling and the prostrate soldier managed to pull himself together, get on his feet and follow in the footsteps of his brave companions. When the San Francisco quartet last saw the soldiers they were still running.

statements leave me in a sceptical state of mind. He says that Professor James promised to send him a communication from beyond the grave if such a thing were possible. When he learned of the pragmatist's death he shut himself up in his study and "summoned his control." But it seems that Dr. Wiggin's "control" is on a vacation. "Ever since I have been on my vacation," says Dr. Wiggin in all seriousness, "my control has been weakened or has disappeared altogether for days at a time. In my individual case the control seems to take a vacation about the same time that I do." This in itself is interesting, as indicating that there are vacation periods beyond the grave, though just why vacations are necessary there remains to be explained. Is there a hot season beyond the grave during which "controls" go to the seashore? At any rate with the "weakened control" the communication with Professor James was unsatisfactory; nevertheless Dr. Wiggin "experienced a strong intimation of a presence in the room." When Professor James first manifested an interest in psychical research he explained that he wished to "find a balm for men's souls." For the sake of humanity it is to be hoped that Dr. Wiggin's "control" will cut short its vacation.

Professor James' Position

In Professor James' reports on the spiritistic investigations which he made he was forced to confess that in most instances he found only trickery. In the case of Mrs. Piper, however, he declared he had found phenomena not to be explained through physical formulas. It was on this account that he chose Mrs. Piper for the supreme test to which the newspapers have devoted so much attention. Less than a year ago Professor James admitted that after twenty-five years of psychical research he was theoretically no further than at the beginning of his investigations. "I confess," he said, "that at times I have been tempted to believe that the Creator has eternally intended this department of nature to remain baffling, to prompt our curiosities and hopes and suspicions, all in equal measure, so that, although ghosts and clairvoyances, and raps and messages from spirits, are always seeming to exist and can never be fully explained away, they also can never be susceptible of full corroboration." When it is recalled that Professor Lombroso gave full credence to the phenomena of Paladino who has since been exposed as an arrant trickster, it will be admitted that Professor James' position was not unduly conservative. I wonder how much faith he would have in Dr. Wiggin's declaration?

The Senatorship

Though A. G. Spalding did not become a candidate for the United States Senate till two weeks before the primary election, and though he did nothing to get votes but make public the announcement of his candidacy, he carried a majority of the Assembly districts, a majority of the Senatorial districts and a majority of the counties. Nevertheless the patriots of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League affirm that he was defeated by Judge Works, familiarly known as Spring Valley Water Works, and revered by carpetbag boomers in southern California counties as the great apostle of State division. The patriots pretend to have discovered a technicality on the strength of which they hope to evade the spirit and nullify the letter of the direct primary law. They tell us it doesn't matter what counties or districts Mr. Spalding carried; that the man who received the plurality vote is entitled to the toga. Yet the law says nothing about plurality votes. The law says: "Members of the legislature shall be at liberty to vote either for the choice of their respective districts expressed at said primary election or for the candidate for United States Senator who shall have received the endorsement of their party at such primary election in the greatest number of districts electing members of such party to the legislature." This language is clear enough. How it can be distorted for technical evasion in the interest of Works is hard to perceive.

Belasco's Little Weakness

David Belasco has an eccentricity rather uncommon among men who have raised themselves by their own exertions to great heights of prosperity and achievement. He wishes to be considered a college man. So whenever the facts of Belasco's early life are detailed in print the statement is always made that he graduated from "Lincoln College, California." This statement is to be found in Who's Who in America as well as in other similar books and was made in one of the August magazines which contained a description of Belasco's elaborate apartments in his new theater building in New York. Of course there is no Lincoln College in California but there is a Lincoln School in San Francisco and it was from that famous grammar school that David Belasco graduated in 1875. When he was last in San Francisco he was the guest of honor at a banquet given by the old Lincolmites among whom are some of the most prominent men of the city. It seems strange that Belasco should endeavor to give the impression that he is a college man when it actually redounds to his credit that he has accomplished so much without the aid of a collegiate training. But the fact remains that it casts a curious sidelight on his character.

Aviators Come High

A short conversation which I had the other day with Mr. George F. Kerr made me cognizant of the enormous sums which the famous aviators of the world receive whenever they consent to risk their lives in the air. Mr. Kerr and Mr. K. L. Barnard are promoting the aviation meet which will be held here from September 24 to October 2 under the auspices of the Panama-Pacific Aero Club. Mr. Kerr told me that the expense of bringing aviators to San Francisco would reach $75,000. The Count and Countess de Lesseps, the well known French aviators, travel with a retinue of twelve assistants and must be guaranteed $16,000 before they will consent to cross the continent. Graham White, the English aviator, will receive $14,000. Hamilton will get $15,000 and the Wright brothers with their two aviators, the same sum. Bud Mars who recently fell 300 yards near Sandy Hook will be paid $6,000. And so it goes. The bird men do not

Ernest Glendenning's Success

Ernest Glendenning, for a long time an Alcazar favorite, has achieved quite a success on Broadway in Margaret Mayo's farce, "Baby Mine." Allan Dale says of him: "Young Mr. Ernest Glendenning—son of a well-seasoned popper—was capital, and played the deluded husband with an unflinching sincerity—which farce demands. It is insincerity that kills farce. When an actor plays farce as though he thought it were funny, he is a dead one. Mr. Glendenning avoided this." Acton Davies says of him in the Evening Sun: "Young Glendenning's work last night was as charming light comedy as any one could hope to see. His three years' work in the Alcazar Stock Company of San Francisco has equipped this youngster thoroughly and last night he stepped into the limelight as an exceptionally fine light comedian. From an artistic standpoint it was the best piece of acting that any young actor has given on the New York stage since William Elliott scored his big hit in 'Madame X'."

Cook in Comfort

You no longer need wear yourself out with the weakening heat of an intensely hot kitchen. You can cook in comfort. Here is a stove that gives no outside heat. All its heat is concentrated at the burners. An intense blue flame (hotter than either white or red) is thrown upwards but not around. All the heat is utilized in cooking—none in outside heating.

New Perfection
WICK BLUE FLAME
Oil Cook-stove

entirely removes the discomfort of cooking. Apply a match and immediately the stove is ready. Instantly an intense heat is projected upwards against the pot, pan, kettle or boiler, and yet there is no surrounding heat—no smell—no smoke.

Cautionary Note: Be sure you get this stove—see that the name-plate reads "New Perfection."

Why? Because The New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove is scientifically and practically perfect. You cannot use too much wick—it is automatically controlled. You get the maximum heat—no smoke. The burner is simple. One wipe with a cloth cleans it—consequently there is no smell.

The New Perfection Oil Cook-Stove is wonderful for year-round use, but especially in summer. Its heat operates upward to pan, pot, or kettle, but not beyond or around. It is useless for heating a room.

It has a Cabinet Top with shelf for keeping plates and food hot.

It has long turquoise-blue enamel chimneys. The nickel finish, with the bright blue of the chimneys, makes the stove ornamental and attractive. Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without Cabinet.

Was He Goaded Into It?

Another subject of discussion is, Why did Joe Eastland cable the announcement of his engagement to Mrs. Vesta Shortridge Bruguere? Although there are plenty of answers vouchsafed by those who pretend to be in the social know, I have yet to hear one which smacks of verisimilitude. Mystery broods over the whole affair. Having a sort of penchant myself for the solution of mysteries I beg leave in no punning spirit to suggest that Joe was goaded into the announcement by Frank Goad. As everybody knows the two volatile clubmen are making a leisurely tour of Europe. They are great friends and have deep respect, each for the other's opinion. Now it stands to reason that Joe Eastland has been kept informed of the social activities of the erstwhile helpmeet of Emile Bruguere. It is not likely that one who exhibited such passionate devotion denials she will relent toward her impetuous admirer and send him an answer which will put the rosy hue of successful romance on the whole interesting business.

The Romantic Vesta

Society in this neck of the woods has never been long without its feminine maker of sensations. There was a time when Miss Ethyl Hager who has since become a staid matron supplied the gossip of the tea tables and quickened the breath of the tabbies by her impulsive doings. At other times other vivacious girls have filled the role acceptably. But I would choose the charming Vesta as the most impetuous, the most original, the most daring, shall I say the most gaze-compelling? of them all. There is a verve in her exuberance which suggests the spring of untiring youth and there is usually a mystery at the bottom of the adventures to which her name is linked which fills curiosity and makes them a full nine days' wonder. Could anything be more attractive in setting than the recent interchange of fisticuffs between her brother and Clare Payne? It is of such stuff that best-sellers are compounded. And when for her sake a lieutenant thumped a major in a swimming tank was there anybody who could say that the feat had its precedent? I challenge the chroniclers of social diversions to recall the time when anything approximating that curious incident occurred in polite society. No wonder those of us who love society for its charming unconventionality are jocund in the thought that Vesta is in our midst.

Our Extraordinary Fashionables

As a matter of fact the bubbling Vesta is only one of a number of fashionables who supply local gossip lovers with the daily food of sensation. In many instances of course our fashionables are subjected to unsought exploitation by the society sleuths of the daily papers who deem nothing too unimportant to chronicle provided it offer excuse for the use of a potent name. And in the opinion of our editors all those names are potent which are hitched to the stars of the ultra-fashionable firmament. Miss Jennie Crocker's is always a name to conjure with. Even if she merely escape arrest for speeding the incident is deemed worthy of tedious narration. When she informs a town constable in answer to his warning, "You're crazy," the retort is given space in print and held up to our admiration as the quintessence of epigrammatic repartee. For this of course Miss Crocker is not in the least to blame. She is a victim of her position. The editors love a shining mark and Miss Crocker is for them a mark of splendiferous effulgence. For the benefit of those outside the pale of smart society who may be inclined on account of this constant exploitation to regard our fashionables with too much awe it becomes necessary from time to time to make the explanation that the men and women who have either inherited or acquired the golden spoon are not essentially different from other folks. They talk and act much as the rest of us do. Some of the women are not quite as beautiful and some of the men not quite as handsome and polite as the heroines and heroes of Indiana fiction. In the words of Sancho Panza, they are as God made them and often a great deal worse.

Our Spinster Jennies

What's in a name and may not a maid marry whether her name be Rosamonde, Guinevere or plain Kate? Surely, to a lover his lady's name is sweetest of the sweet, but however that may have been from time immemorial does it not seem that the name Jennie when allied to wealth in San Francisco becomes a synonym for spinsterhood? There was Jennie Flood, the pioneer Jennie of wealth and fashion. Suitors from far and near she had in the early days and if rumor be true, has to the present date. But Miss Jennie she persists in remaining. Some seasons later bloomed the handsome Jennie Dunphy. She was dowered with everything that lovely woman covets and suitors clamored for her heart and hand. Well, when her contemporaries have grown children, she still remains beautiful and to the fascinating Vesta as Joe Eastland did would allow distance to diminish the measure of his interest. So I take it that he has followed closely all of her vivacious activities. I take it that he has made Frank Goad the confidant of his most intimate cogitations. The whole mystery now seems clarified. What more natural than that Frank Goad should argue Joe into the achievement of a coup? It is easy to see how the idea of sending cablegrams to the three morning newspapers would allure by its very sensationalism, for our society youth dearly love a sensation, particularly when they have a hand in it. In my mind's eye I glimpse the twain in Turin chuckling over the bomb which they have thrown into society. I glimpse them too assuring each other that the fair Vesta would be won by the very daring of the maneuver, particularly as she has manifested considerable partiality for Joe in the past. And it may be that despite her hot charming Miss Jennie Dunphy. A generation later appeared Miss Jennie Blair. Along with many gifts and blessings she had unusual vivacity and glorious Titian hair. She has these attractions still, but though she sparkled first in society not much later than the matronly Mrs. Oelrichs, no ardent suitor has induced her to become other than Miss Jennie Blair. In the present day and generation we have Miss Jennie Crocker. She perhaps has more wealth than any of the other Jennies as well as position, good looks and every possible advantage. Needless to say she has a train of suitors but it is said that she says "she will never marry—no never!" So there really seems to be a fatality of spinsterhood attached to Jennie—when she lives in San Francisco and is rich and handsome and charming.

The Crocker Ball

At this writing the coming-out party of Miss Ethel Crocker, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Will Crocker, has not taken place but I am assured that it is to be a function of surpassing brilliance and that it will set a new mark in our social records. Not having the pen of Robert Chambers it is useless for me to describe the preparations which have transformed New Place into a fairy demesne. Most interesting of all the circumstances surrounding this party, it seems to me, is the fact that Miss Crocker will be surrounded by her most intimate girl friends, young ladies who have still to make their formal bow to the regnant powers of society. Among these are ing when it is applied to so charming a young lady as Miss Helen Grey. Some time ago I told of the departure for the East of this young lady who went traveling at the solicitation of her family which did not look with favor on her favorable regard for young Sydney Woodruff, the architect. I told also that Sydney Woodruff had gone East, ostensibly because the demands of his profession called him across the continent. It turns out that mutual affection has been too strong for the watchful family of Miss Grey and that the two young people found many mutual friends in New York and many opportunities of enjoying each other's society. So Miss Grey's folks have brought her home again. But they

A special train will convey guests from San Francisco to New Place and will bring them home when the party is over.

About Miss Helen Grey

It is more than a little trite to say that love will find a way but the remark is always interest-have not thus put a continent between her and her wooer. Mr. Woodruff is once more in San Francisco.

An Important Engagement Coming

Santa Barbara society is on the tiptoe of expectation over an engagement which will probably be announced soon. The romance concerns one of the Tevis twins and beautiful Miss Dibblee. Although the young lady is a few years older than the young man it is said that Mrs. Will Tevis who was Miss Mabel Pacheco has given her consent to the match.

When the Pie Was Opened

An engagement which comes as a genuine surprise even to her most intimate friends is that of Miss Christine Judah and Dr. Chester Roadhouse. So closely did Miss Judah guard her secret that when she entertained a bridge club to which she belongs and invited her friends informally to join in a cup of tea later they had no suspicion of the truth until led into the dining room. There they were confronted by a huge pie decorated with rare exotics. Ribbon streamers were handed to the guests who drew forth dainty envelopes bearing the names of the plighted couple. Miss Judah is the only daughter

A Ten-Year Romance

The recent marriage of Miss Irene Tay and Samuel Sprague Magruder was the culmination of a romance which began ten years ago. It was during the Spanish war when Mr. Magruder was lying very ill in the hospital that the couple first met. Like many other young ladies Miss Tay visited the hospitals and rendered much valuable service to the sick and wounded. During a visit East Miss Tay met and visited Mr.
Magruder's family who are greatly pleased with the marriage. The Tay family are old and prominent residents of this city. Her father, the late George H. Tay, was a well known business man.
The family includes two sisters, Mrs. Thomas Fletcher of New York, formerly Hattie Tay and Mrs. Edwin Danforth, formerly Jennie Tay who has been a widow many years. An only brother died several years ago and his widow is now the wife of Justice Henshaw of the Supreme Court.
All the members of the Tay family inherited a comfortable fortune from their parents. Mr. and Mrs. Magruder have gone South on their wedding tour. Upon their return they will reside in this city.

A Talented Miniaturist

San Francisco's art colony has just been augmented by the coming of Miss May Slessinger, a San Franciscan whose miniature painting has attracted a great deal of attention in the East.
Miss Slessinger has finished some superb miniatures of late, and not the least notable is that of William Keith, the artist. Keith has the highest praise for the work. Society has taken up San Francisco's latest miniaturist and her studio will become one of the most prominent. Miss Sles-singer followed her art studies in the East for several years and was very successful there in painting some well known celebrities of the stage.
She is now at work upon the portraits of several of San Francisco's smart set.

when fish are again beginning to bite. Shasta has for the moment veiled her pure and austere beauty behind the haze of distant forest fires, but the Crag's loom up in all their grim and rugged grandeur and the skies smile as only California skies can smile. A peep at the register shows that guests from all over the United States have enjoyed the hospitality of Castle Crag this sea-

Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Todd, Berkeley; Mrs.

"The Battle" and Wilton Lackaye

It is perhaps too much to expect that one man shall excel both in newspapering and playwriting. In the more recent crops of dramatists there have been a number of journalists—Mr. Walter and Mr. Hurlbut, for instance; but it is doubtful whether they were ever very good reporters. Cleveland Moffett, on the other hand, known as an excellent newspaperman and that must serve as his excuse for showing deficiencies as a dramatist. The reportorial habit when developed to its full extent seems to be fatal to the dramatic instinct. The reporter is taught to be impartial, to present his facts in the most effective ordination of course, but still to show no leaning to this or that side of the matter he is treating. It is inevitable therefore that when the reportorial attitude of mind is fixed the reporter should be lacking in that exuberance of sympathy with which the ordinary man embraces one side or the other of an argument. He is so used to holding the balance level, to studying both sides of any question; to analyzing conflicting motives and to presenting aspects of a case that differ diametrically that in the end he finds himself unenthusiastic, of cold demeanor, unresponsive, nay perhaps suspicious or cynical. It is likely that Cleveland Moffett's newspaper career has carried him through these phases of mental experience. For in his play "The Battle" he is very successful in presenting the two sides on a shield and his endeavor to present both sides on an equally favorable light is so apparent as to destroy the dramatic interest of his play. "The Battle" is not a thesis, as so many good plays are; it does not embody a positive idea to the elucidation of which all the situations are bent or if necessary wrenched. Far from it. Moffett has been so impartial that he has forgotten to thrill our sympathies. He has laid before us arguments pro and con on the difficult subject of capital and labor and has permitted us to choose for ourselves. His play bears the same relation to real drama that a cafeteria does to a restaurant; you choose what suits you, make your meal out of it and pay. It is a very convenient system, no doubt; it is the sort of thing that will please people who like that sort of thing, to paraphrase the great Barnum—but there are quite a number of us who like to be served in the old way that was good enough for our grandfathers. I believe that the socialists made some small stir in New York by rising from their seats in the theater and answering the arguments of "The Battle." The anti-socialists might have done exactly the same thing if they were inclined to picturesque methods of propaganda; for there are arguments in "The Battle" for both parties and every one of them, on either side, is answerable. Mr. Moffett prepared "The Battle" as he would have prepared a newspaper symposium on one of the burning questions of the hour—with the thought ever present that his play would be bound to have spectators of divergent opinions just as his paper would have readers of opposite views. Too bad Mr. Moffett is so good a newspaperman. If he had only had the good fortune to fail in journalism he might have had the makings of an excellent dramatist. Another way in which Mr. Moffett displays his journalistic training is in a tenacious memory of well worn stage usages. His play is reminiscent of many other plays. There is a scene here and a situation there that have been used many a time and oft. His technique is old fashioned and that is equivalent, in these self-sufficient times, to damn his technique altogether. But if Mr. Moffett has the defects of his newspaper qualities he also has their merits and the chief of these consists in maintaining the interest of his subject. He is never dull. One no more thinks of yawning at Mr. Moffett's play than one would of falling asleep over his newspaper articles. There is something doing all the time and it is well worth watching. Good reporter that he is Mr. Moffett has also depicted his segments of life with keen circumstantiality. He has the nose for detail that is essential to a good newspaperman and as a result his characters ring true metal in their modes of doing and speaking. That no doubt was why the play appealed to the managers. Just why it appealed to Mr. Wilton Lackaye is another question. Probably because it was the best play that presented itself. This is surely an unfortunate condition. While Mr. Lackaye gives a splendid interpretation of the leading role, getting out of it the last iota of effectiveness and laying before us a characterization which cannot but excite admiration, it still remains true that it is not the sort of a part on which Mr. Lackaye should be lavishing his abundant abilities. He should have something bigger and better and if the playwrights of the moment lack the complexity of genius which would enable them to supply it, surely there are plenty of masterpieces which he could revive. There are plenty of actors who could do justice to the role which Mr. Lackaye ornaments in "The Battle" but there are too few actors on the American stage who measure up to the parts which Mr. Lackaye would be capable of interpreting. Does Mr. Lackaye feel that theatrical progress demands the enactment of new parts season after season? Might he not go forward in his art by going backward for fitting roles? If there is a lull in adequate dramatic output today why not summon to the stage the glorious plays of yesterday? That these are not impertinent questions the enthusiasm with which managers in the East are reviving almost dusty masterpieces would seem to indicate.

Mr. Lackaye, think it over!

—Edward F. O'Day.

SCENE FROM ROSE STAHL'S COMEDY "THE CHORUS LADY" AT THE COLUMBIA THEATER

The Bevani in "Faust"

Every operagoer has his favorite opera but it is more than likely that most of us put "Faust" somewhere near the top of the list. Its charm, no doubt, lies largely in the sensuousness of the music and partly in the direct appeal of a simple story told with unusual dramatic skill. Even the barrel organs have never been able to kill the popularity of "Faust." It was therefore a happy inspiration which suggested that the season of the Bevani Grand Opera Company at the Garrick Theater should begin with "Faust." An opera season which does not begin with "Aida" is noteworthy from the jump, if only because it is different from other opera seasons. The Bevani season bids fair to be noteworthy after a more worthy fashion. It is an aggregation of very capable singers who are at the same time quite capable actors, it boasts a mighty good chorus and is presided over by Roberto Francini, a conductor of intelligence and abounding interpretative sympathy. Those of the Bevani company who made their bow in "Faust" created a most favorable impression evidenced by applause critically but liberally bestowed. It is the applause which tells the story of operatic failure or success in a city like San Francisco where good music is constantly demanded. You cannot wring applause from a typical San Francisco grand opera audience. It must be won fairly by good singing and then it is given ungrudgingly. That was the case with the first singing of "Faust" at the Garrick. The audience was careful to satisfy itself about every voice and then it crowned the various efforts by appropriate meeds of applause. Of the men Ettore Campana who sang Valentine received the greatest single ovation and there was no reason why it should have been otherwise. He has a beautiful baritone set off by spirited acting and a graceful presence.

RAMESES

The Egyptian Wonder Worker who will appear this Sunday night at the Orpheum

In his death scene he was exceedingly effective and had the good fortune to receive fitting support from the Marguerite of the cast, Anna Frery. Miss Frery has a voice of great sweetness. It is her first simple "No, signor" which indicates whether Marguerite is to be well or ill sung and in the case of Miss Frery there was so much maiden modesty uttered in dulcet tones in that first repulse to Faust that lively expectations were excited by her brief appearance. Fortunately Miss Frery deepened the impression by her subsequent singing. Alexander Bevani sang Mephisto with great gusto and acted the part admirably. In the "Calf of Gold" scene he was particularly good. The Faust of Eugenio Battain was also a very satisfactory rendition. The audience had occasion more than once to testify their approval of his singing. The Siebel of Margaret Jarman and the Martha of Lucy Van der Mark were pleasing renditions. Altogether it was a musical treat. This "Faust" certainly will bear rehearing.

—The Music Lover.

Margaret Illington at the Savoy

Her health having been regained Miss Margaret Illington has returned to the stage and will come to the Savoy Theater for an engagement of two weeks beginning next Monday evening. Miss Illington will be seen in a new play derived from a French source, entitled "Until Eternity," adapted for her by Edward Elsner. This play which is said to exploit Miss Illington's well known emotional powers to their highest degree, is described as an uncommonly adroit and well made drama, replete with moving situations and artfully contrived suspenses, founded on a plot that is well provided with human and dramatic interest. Miss Illington will be seen in the character of a repentant wife and heart broken mother. Wilton Lackaye and his company will appear for the last times in "The Battle" at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening, and on Sunday evening the playhouse will be dark, as Miss Illington plays but six nights a week. She will give the customary popular priced matinee on Thursday.

Frances Starr in "The Easiest Way"

The return engagement of Rose Stahl in "The Chorus Lady" at the Columbia Theater is proving a pronounced success. The final performance is announced for the night of Sunday, September 18. On the night of Monday, September 19, David Belasco will present at the Columbia an attraction of unusual note, Frances Starr in Eugene Walter's greatest play "The Easiest Way." The advance sale of seats for "The Easiest Way" opens at the theater next Thursday morning. Positively no orders will be taken in advance. Requests for seats by mail and telegraph will be filled in the order of their receipt. Matinees will be given Wednesday and Saturday.

Rameses at the Orpheum

Rameses, the Egyptian Wonder Worker, will appear in his Temple of Mystery in which he performs a variety of startling feats, at the Orpheum next week. High Life in Jail, a travesty by Ben Shields, will be an amusing feature of the new bill. Wm. H. Sloan and W. H. (Bill) Mack impersonate the two principal roles. Zellah Covington and Rose Wilbur will present "The Parsonage," a play in which these two clever artists represent seven different characters in as many scenes. The Four Rianos will be heartily welcomed for their original and funny acrobatic sketch, "In Africa." Next week terminates the engagements of

Bert Kalmar and Jessie Brown, The Jack Arton Duo, The Bison City Four and George Auge and his players in "Jack the Giant Killer."

Charming Comedy at Alcazar

A charming comedy is "Such a Little Queen" which will be given its first presentation in San Francisco next Monday evening and throughout the week in the Alcazar. It was written by Channing Pollock, author of "In the Bishop's Carriage," "Clothes" and other successes and was produced in New York, where it had a long run last season, the critics pronounced it his masterpiece. Jane Gordon will be seen as the queen, Thurston Hall as the king, Thomas Chatterton as Trainor, Burt Wesner as the prime minister, Will R. Walling as the pork packer, Grace Babbour as his daughter, Adele Belgarde as haughty American servant, Catherine Calhoun as a telephone girl, Howard Hickman as the landlord of the flat in which royalty resides, Louis Bennison as a Bosnian general and the remainder of the company in equally congenial roles.

The Ellery Band at Idora

With each succeeding concert the Ellery Band at Idora Park in Oakland has increased in popularity. For the remainder of the season the evening concerts, with the exception of those on Sundays, will be played indoors. The daily matinees, outside of the Tuesday symphonies and the Thursday lecture-musicals, will be rendered in the outdoor shell as usual. Col. Ellery takes particular pains in arranging his Sunday concert and for tomorrow the Royal Italian Band will render two exceedingly interesting programs, both of which will run the gamut from the classics to the popular airs of the day. During the week the band plays a number of special concerts.

"Divorcons" at Ye Liberty

For the second week of the engagement of their new leading lady, Muriel Hope, the management of Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, have arranged for a production of "Divorcons," the celebrated comedy success adapted from the French of Victorien Sardou. It will mark the first time this delightful play has received stock production in California and likewise its first presentation at popular prices. The part of the captivating and capricious Cyprienne will afford Miss Hope a better vehicle for the display of her talents, if anything, than she enjoyed in Becky Warder in "The Truth" this week and her success in this latter role argues well for a charming performance of the French heroine.

Grand Opera at the Garrick

The Bevani Grand Opera Company is scoring a brilliant triumph at the Garrick Theater. At today's (Saturday) matinee "Martha" will be revived. Tonight (Saturday) "Trovatore" will be given. Tomorrow (Sunday matinee) "Faust" will be sung and for tomorrow (Sunday night) "Rigoletto" will be the performance. The repertoire for next week is as follows: Monday night and Saturday matinee, "Love Tales of Hoffman"; Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday night, "Aida"; Wednesday night and Sunday matinee, "La Traviata"; Friday night, "Trovatore"; Saturday night, "Rigoletto."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Nothing eventful transpired in the stock market during the past week. The general trend of stock values was toward a still lower level in both industrials and railroads. If there was any feature to the movement of values from day to day it was in foreign selling accompanied by some further liquidation here in the absence of any sustaining factor of enough significance to turn the ebbing tide. Certainly the representatives of the financial world returning from abroad brought no evidence that American securities have lost ground as a whole in the European estimate of their attractiveness, during the past summer. Railroads continue to gain in gross earnings in spite of dullness in certain trade areas. Their best months are however right ahead of them. From crop moving territory the outlook is reported by large commercial houses which have measured the situation in anticipation of the autumn's demand for goods as favorable. The crop outlook generally is considered favorable. The corn crop, barring an early frost, promises to be the largest on record. Wheat too shows an improvement over last month's estimates. The past week has also been very favorable to the cotton growing crop, and with the high prices being paid for all commodities it means added wealth to the nation. In the meantime stocks are selling at bargain prices and trade is confined mostly to the rank and file of the professional trader.

Wheat—The wheat market the past week has been rather quiet with prices fluctuating within a very narrow range. The foreign markets have been as a rule very firm especially Paris, and rumors of large export sales were heard from all quarters. But these rumors of large export sales were cut down to small lots. Our receipts have been large and stocks of wheat have been accumulating at all primary market points. This has necessitated hedging sales by the elevator interests. Deliveries on September contract for the first three days of September were large, which would indicate a poor demand for the cash article. The outsider has been kept busy selling out his September and replacing it with either December or May, causing a big premium for both these options over the September. The elevator man has done just the opposite, taking in the cash wheat and selling the distant futures. Sentiment continues universally bullish and every one is predicting higher prices later on. In the meantime we must dispose of some of our wheat to the foreigner and while there has been some sold it has proven to have been a very low grade of wheat. We are still out of line about 4 cents per bushel and we must get to an export level soon or other exporting countries will supply the importing countries and leave us with a big stock of wheat on hand which will be a barrier against any big upturn in price around the first of the year. Russia seems to have plenty of wheat for sale and is offering wheat much below us. Australia, Argentine and India are doing likewise. The situation at the moment looks very bearish and lower prices are inevitable.

Corn—Fear of frost during the early part of September has made the bears cautious in selling the deferred futures and our market has been at a standstill. Receipts of old corn are increasing rapidly and the eastern demand is flat. A good many in the trade consider the corn crop this year from two weeks to a month late but this old argument is used every year and admitting the crop is a little late unless we get a freeze before September 15 we will raise the largest crop of corn on record. The farmer does not seem at all anxious about frost doing any considerable damage to his crop and is marketing his old corn rather freely. In fact receipts are almost twice as large as last year and receiving houses expect them to continue large for some time to come. Export business is out of the question. The market looks lower.

Cotton—Manipulation in August corn the first part of the week put that option up to 20 cents, the highest price since the Civil War. At this price a settlement was made with the unfortunate shorts who were caught in the squeeze. In the meantime the bulls were forced to take a lot of actual cotton which had been rushed forward to apply on sales made earlier in the month. This cotton is known as the corpse. In order to protect themselves they in turn sold the September option and all cotton taken in on August contracts will be delivered on September contracts. The market the past week has been very nervous awaiting the Government's figures which were posted last Friday. These figures showed a condition of 72.1 compared with 66.3 last year and while they were about as expected, they indicated a crop of about two million bales more than last year. With further rains reported in Texas the bears became aggressive and pounded the market, the bulls withdrawing their support. Receipts of cotton are heavy at all market centers and the mill men are playing a waiting game, only buying on a hand to mouth basis. The market looks heavy and with increasing receipts and more favorable weather from now on prices should work lower.

Copper—The situation in copper remains practically unchanged and quiet but prices closed the week steady without quotable change. The demand for the metal continues slow and no good buying movement is looked for until late in September. In the meantime copper stocks will follow the trend of prices in the big exchange.

"Quite. What a manner she has. Such reserve, such a tender way with the child."

"Pity she has the child to attend to," exclaimed the student from Bonn. He had hitherto relied upon three scars and a ribbon to produce an effect, but the sister of a Baroness demanded more than these.

Absorbing days followed. Had she been one whit less beautiful born we could not have endured the continual conversation about her, the songs of her praises the detailed account of her movements. But she graciously suffered our worship and we were more than content.

The poet she took into her confidence. He carried her books when we went walking, he jumped the afflicted one on his knee—poetic license, this—and one morning brought his notebook into the salon and read to us.

"The sister of the Baroness has assured me she is going into a convent," he said. (That made the student from Bonn sit up). "I have written these few lines last night from my window in the sweet night air—"

"Oh, your delicate chest," commented the Frau Doktor.

He fixed a stony eye on her, and she blushed. "I have written these lines:—"

"Ah, will you to a convent fly
So young, so fresh, so fair,
Spring like a doe upon the fields
And find your beauty there."

Nine verses equally lovely commanded her to equally violent action. I am certain had she followed his advice not even the remainder of her life in a convent would have given her time to recover her breath.

"I have presented her with a copy," he said. "And today we are going to look for wild flowers in the wood."

The student from Bonn got up and left the room. I begged the poet to repeat the verses once more. At the end of the sixth verse I saw from the window the sister of the Baroness and the scarred youth disappearing through the front gate, which enabled me to thank the poet so charmingly that he offered to write me out a copy.

But we were living at too high a pressure in those days. Swinging from our humble pension to the high walls of palaces how could we help but fall. Late one afternoon the Frau Doktor came upon me in the writing room and took me to her bosom.

"She has been telling me all about her life," whispered the Frau Doktor. "She came to my bedroom and offered to massage my arm. You know I am the greatest martyr to rheumatism. And, fancy now, she has already had six proposals of marriage. Such beautiful offers that I assure you I wept—and every one of noble birth. My dear, the most beautiful was in a wood. Not that I do not think a proposal should take place in a drawing room—it is more fitting to have four walls—but this was a private wood. He said, the young officer, she was like a young tree whose branches had never been touched by the ruthless hand of man. Such delicacy!" She sighed and turned up her eyes.

"Of course it is difficult for you English to understand when you are always exposing your legs on cricket fields, and breeding dogs in your back gardens. The pity of it! Youth should be like a wild rose. For myself I do not understand how your women ever get married at all."

She shook her head so violently that I shook mine too and a gloom settled round my heart. It seemed we were really in a very bad way. Did the spirit of romance spread her rose wings only over aristocratic Germany?

I went up to my room, bound a pink scarf about my hair, and took a volume of Morike's lyrics into the garden. A great bush of purple lilac grew behind the summer-house. There I sat down, finding a sad significance in the delicate suggestion of half mourning. I began to write a poem myself.

"They sway and languish dreamily.

And we, close pressed, are kissing there."

It ended! "Close pressed" did not sound at all fascinating. Savoured of wardrobes. Did my wild rose then already trail in the dust? I chewed a leaf and hugged my knees. Then—magic moment—I heard voices from the summer-house, the sister of the Baroness and the student from Bonn.

Secondhand was better than nothing; I picked up my ears.

"What small hands you have," said the student from Bonn. "They were like white lilies lying in the pool of your black dress." This certainly sounded the real thing. Her high born reply was what interested me. Sympathetic murmur only.

"May I hold one?"

I heard two sighs—presumed they held—he had rifled those dark waters of a noble blossom.

"Look at my great fingers beside yours."

"But they are beautifully kept," said the sister of the Baroness, shyly.

The minx! Was love then a question of manicure?

"How I should adore to kiss you," murmured the student. "But you know I am suffering from severe nasal catarrh, and I dare not risk giving it to you. Sixteen times last night did I count myself sneezing. And three different handkerchiefs."

I threw Morike into the lilac bush, and went back to the house. A great automobile snorted at the front door. In the salon great commotion. The Baroness was paying a surprise visit to her little daughter. Clad in a yellow mackintosh she stood in the middle of the room questioning the manager. And every guest the pension contained was grouped about her, even the Frau Doktor, presumably examining a time table, as near to the August Skirts as possible.

"But where is my maid?" asked the Baroness. "There was no maid," replied the manager, "save for your gracious sister and daughter." "Sister!" she cried sharply. "Fool, I have no sister. My child travelled with the daughter of my dressmaker."

Tableau grandissimo!

The Physicians of the Murine Eye Remedy Company, Chicago, U. S. A., Oculists of years' standing, carefully prepare "The Murine Eye Remedies" in the Company's Laboratory. These Remedies are the result of their Clinical, Hospital and Private Practice, and they have found from their years of experience with Children's Eyes, that two drops of Murine in each Eye of the Growing Child is of inestimable value. Murine is an Eye Tonic and they know, if it is used regularly, that it Tones the Eye of the Growing Child and in many instances obviates the use of Glasses, and is it not reasonable that Glasses when not required will retard the development of a young and growing Eye?

Murine, through its Tonic effect, Stimulates Healthy Circulation and thus promotes the normal development of the Eye. We do not believe there is a Mother who has used Murine in her own Eyes and in the Eyes of the members of her family who would be without it, or who is not willing to speak of its Merits as The Household Friend.

The Child in the Schoolroom needs Murine. Murine contains no harmful or prohibited Drugs, and conforms to the Laws of the Country.

osing your head. As for me, I have been reflecting here for days and weeks, and I am sure of two things at least: First, that I do not want to live with you any longer, and, second, that I want to live with him. Only, as I respect your name, and as your honor must not be sullied nor your whole life ruined on my account, this is what I propose to you.

"And she made me this incredible, astounding proposition: 'I am going to die—that is, of course, appear to die—and if you lend yourself to my plan and do not forget any of the precautions I will give you, nobody will perceive the trick. Our family vault is roomy and in a lonely place. The same evening you will send the key to him whose name you will find after my death, written upon a piece of paper in this drawer.'

"That, my dear fellow, was what she proposed to me. Indeed, it could only have proceeded from the brain of a woman beside herself with passion. Edith, that generous and tender maiden, to speak such words, and with such a wilful ferocity! And I felt that she had planned all this lovingly, as a possible solution upon which her happiness depended; a thing which I had no right to refuse; and if this failed, she would go away, and live with him openly. I was irresistibly convinced of that. So I accepted."

I looked at him with astonishment. He was very calm. He filled his pipe, lighted it, and continued in a light tone:

"My faith, yes, I accepted. What would you have me do! There was no choice for me. She would take herself off, the hussy, unknown to everyone. It was the only means by which the affair could be kept among ourselves—between her, me, and him. She died of an attack of despair. Out of respect for my despair, they allowed me to watch with her alone, to put her into her shroud, to fasten her in her coffin. And all this did not fail to amuse us. We laughed a great deal, she and I. This little play seemed comical to us. Upon my honor, I did not utter a word of reproach, and my farewell was quite without anger.

"I pardon you," I said to her.

"And I nailed the coffin conscientiously, without forgetting a nail.

"The interment took place. It was very sad, you remember, Rodolphe. My grief impressed everybody—a silent grief, without tears. They put her into the vault. I myself closed the door and carried away the key in my pocket.

"Such is the story of my marriage."

He rose and began to pace the floor, whistling, as if the adventure was over.

"Well?" I said, a little anxiously.

"Well, what?"

"But the key?"

"What key?" He seemed to be reflecting, then he exclaimed: "Oh, yes! The key of the vault—upon my word, I must own that I was greatly embarrassed. Just fancy—I was never able to find the paper upon which my wife had written her lover's name. Had she forgotten that formality? Had I misunderstood her? I was much puzzled; to whom should I send this cursed key? I thought that at least the thing had been understood between them, and every day I waited for the gentleman to come and claim his mistress from me. No one came."

In the deep silence I heard a rattling sound. I looked at Rodolphe. He was white as a sheet, and his lips were muttering sounds. Then I had a sudden intuition of the fearful truth. But was it possible, was it possible? Hubert however, had gone over beside him, and said, very gently:

"What ails my good Rodolphe? Ah, it is true, I never told you this. I was afraid of distressing you—you, who also loved her so well. And you were so kind to me, consoling me, coming every day to mingle your tears with mine!"

He covered him with his savage eyes, his little, feeble body leaning over Rodolphe's giant frame, and he said:

"Listen, Rodolphe; I have a service to ask of you. Until today I have had the firmness to keep the key; but really, it troubles me—and then I have waited long enough. Will you keep it?"

He opened the folds of his shirt. From his neck, at the end of a chain, against his skin, hung a little key, all rusted, the color of blood.

Washington boasted he couldn't tell a lie.

"Then you will have to own up that you didn't enjoy your vacation," his father replied.

Herewith the youthful George shivered at the prospect.

Auto Notes

Among the most ardent supporters of Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread tires is C. William Kolb, the famous German comedian. Kolb owns a Chalmers "30" with which he has toured practically all of California.

C. B. McCoy of Los Angeles, father of H. D. McCoy of the Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co., passed through town recently on the return trip of a tour made from the Southern California metropolis to Lake County in a Premier car. The Hartford tires that equipped the car still carried the air with which they were inflated when the run began.

A very decided guarantee of the true stock character of their cars entered in stock racing events is given by the Lozier Motor Company's offer to sell any of the cars that they contemplate entering at any time previous to the race concerned for the regular stock car price.

No better indication is given of the thoroughness with which the automobile is being used in every corner of the country than the success of J. C. Coe in introducing the Chalmers in Moosejaw, Canada. Moosejaw is still a typical frontier town and a year ago an automobile was enough of a novelty to the place to call out the whole population when it passed through the streets. Today, however, Chalmers cars are found scorching every highway in the vicinity. The farmer particularly have taken to the gasoline wagon.

Earl Anthony, manager of the Western Motor Car Co., Los Angeles distributors for Chalmers and Hudson cars, has just passed through town en route for the Southern California metropolis. He anticipates great business in Southern California this coming season and is elated by his success in obtaining allotments far in excess of those received by him for the season just closing.

Chester Meyers, one of the best known of western mechanical engineers, has just taken delivery of a Hudson touring car which will be used extensively for business purposes in connection with the Norman B. Livermore Co. with which Meyers is associated.

Glenn H. Curtiss, the noted aviator, although completely absorbed in his work, finds recreation in automobilism and has recently purchased an Oakland runabout from the factory's representative, the Pittsburg Automobile Company.

Frank Johnson, the well known local aviator and motor expert, has just taken delivery of a Hupmobile. This popular little car has experienced no quiet season this summer and S. G. Chapman has been compelled to keep urging more frequent shipments from the factory. At present several shipments of Hupmobiles are en route for San Francisco, one of which contains a number of the 1911 Hupmobile Coupes.

The most strenuous motorcycle contest ever held in this country was undoubtedly the big 506 mile endurance run of the F. A. M. recently made out of Philadelphia. According to reports just received by Tony Nichols of the Weinstock Nichols Company, out of 125 entries but 24 survived long enough to finish and of these but three, all Thors, had perfect scores.

A. W. Jackson has just equipped his car with Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread tires furnished by the Weinstock Nichols Co. of this city.

W. J. Pedlar of the J. W. Leavitt Company has just returned from an extensive vacation trip made in an Overland car. After touring all of the Lake Tahoe section Pedlar drove on to Reno and thence return was made to San Francisco via Truckee. Pedlar reports all roads in good condition and much traveled by automobile tourists.

A feature of motor truck developments is the extensive use being made of these vehicles for the U. S. Mail service in different cities throughout the country. Among the latest of these departments to recognize the efficiency of the motor carriage is that of Saginaw, Michigan, which, according to advices received by the local branch of the Howard Automobile Co., is employing three Buick trucks. These machines are meeting thirty-seven trains daily traveling on the average of over fifty miles each and giving perfect satisfaction.

1911 CHALMERS MOTOR CARS

WILL ARRIVE AUGUST 15th

Refined But Practically Unchanged 1909 and 1910 Good Enough

The Chalmers cars come from a factory producing quality and not quantity. THE CHALMERS PRINCIPLE is not to make as many cars as possible, but TO MAKE EACH INDIVIDUAL CAR AS GOOD AS POSSIBLE.

We regret that we were not able to furnish 1909 and 1910 models to all who wanted them, and while we fear that some were offended when told that they could not get the cars they wanted, we assure every one that it is much harder to tell a prospective buyer that he cannot have the car than it is to show him why he should have one.

It is possible that the Chalmers factory could build a sufficient number of cars to take care of every available customer, but in so doing they would, like a large number of other factories, sacrifice quality for quantity, and every car sold would not make a customer for another, as has been our experience during the past two years.

A few cars are still available for September delivery.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MORTGAGED

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, No. 10,340, N. S., Old Number 26,928, Department No. 9, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of MARY ANN ARMSTRONG, Deceased.

Albert Knorr, George Knorr and Frank Knorr, as Executors of the Last Will of Mary Ann Armstrong, deceased, having this day filed herein their duly verified petition praying for an order authorizing them to mortgage the real property hereinafter described, belonging to the estate of said decedent.

It is hereby ordered and directed that all persons interested in the estate of said Mary Ann Armstrong, deceased, be and they are hereby directed to appear before said Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, Department Number Nine thereof, on Wednesday, the 12th day of October, 1910, at ten o'clock a. m. of said day, at the Courtroom of said Department in the Grant Building, southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the same being the time and place hereby fixed for the hearing of said petition, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why the following described real property situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

First—Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Ellis Street, distant thereon 192 feet 3 inches westerly from the westerly line of Van Ness Avenue, running thence westerly along said northerly line of Ellis Street 35 feet; thence at right angles northerly 120 feet, thence at right angles easterly and parallel with Ellis Street 55 feet; thence at right angles southerly 120 feet and to the place of beginning. Being a portion of Western Addition Block Old Number Eighty-one (81). New Number Five Hundred and Three (503).

Second—Commencing at a point on the southerly line of McAllister Street, distant thereon one hundred and thirty-eight (138) feet and four (4) and one-half (½) inches easterly from the easterly line of Van Ness Avenue, and thence running easterly along said southerly line of McAllister Street thirty-eight (38) feet and four (4) and one-half (½) inches; thence at a right angle southerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to the northerly line of Ash Avenue; thence at a right angle westerly along said line of Ash Avenue thirty-eight (38) feet and four (4) and one-half (½) inches, and thence at a right angle northerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to said southerly line of McAllister Street and the point of commencement. Being a part of Western Addition Block Old Number Sixty-six (66). New Number Four Hundred and Seventy (470).

or such part thereof as to the Court may see meet, should not be mortgaged for the sum of Ten Thousand Dollars ($10,000.00) or such lesser sum as to the Court may seem just, as prayed for in the petition on file, reference to which is hereby made for further particulars.

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four (4) successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Dated: September 1st, 1910.

The people of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interests in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Mrs. Katherine Sinclair and John William Sinclair, plaintiffs, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Greenwich street, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-two (122) feet, four (4) inches westerly from the westerly line of Scott street; running thence westerly and along the said southerly line of Greenwich street fifty-three (53) feet, seven (7) inches; thence at right angles southerly eighty-two (82) feet; thence at right angles easterly forty-three (43) feet, five (5) inches; thence northeasterly fifteen (15) feet, thence easterly seven (7) feet, eight (8) inches; and thence at right angles northerly sixty-eight (68) feet, nine (9) inches to the southerly line of Greenwich street and the point of commencement.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute; that their title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

Witness my hand and seal of said Court this 16th day of August, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

(Seal) By M. GRAGEN, Deputy Clerk.

Memorandum—The first publication of this summons was made in Town Talk newspaper on the 27th day of August, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon said property adverse to plaintiffs: Names, Elizabeth G. Baldwin, Addresses, The City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation.

"The Native Born"

Though "The Native Born" hardly challenges comparison with Mrs. Steele's "On the Face of the Waters," it is, for all that, a most interesting story, timely in connection with the native unrest in India, and for a first novel, remarkable. It does not show promise, for it IS fulfillment. If I. A. R. Wylie does not prove to be the pen name of some already well-known writer, readers of the more serious novels have treats in store whenever a new book by her is put forth. The theme is the race question, and the incidents in the tale are the aftermath of events which occurred in the same environment a quarter of a century before. The Rajah Behar Asor was a good friend to the English, a man of advanced opinions for his time and his race. His confidence was cruelly betrayed and in consequence he declared a revolt against their rule and owing in part to the isolation of his kingdom he succeeded in his war of extermination, carrying out his plans for fully a year before sufficient troops were sent against him to defeat his forces. Before the reinforcements arrived the few remaining members of the English guard, as is the time-honored custom of civilized men when dealing with savages or fanatics, reserved their last shot for themselves, the last but one for their wives. The Rajah Behar Asor disappeared, and was believed to have perished in the jungle, his year-old infant son was placed upon the throne under the regency of a neighboring prince, and Merut strongly garrisoned. The community endured in peace and prosperity. The Prince Nehal Singh, kept in the closest of seclusion, was generally believed to be an imbecile, and the English rejoiced that he was thus powerless to make trouble. In reality the old Rajah was not dead. He had made his escape with the help of his followers, and secluded in his palace, he had devoted his life to the up-bringing of the young prince, with the sole motive of imbuing him with such contempt and hatred for the English that when the time was ripe he, too, would revolt. Nehal Singh, so far from being an imbecile, was a man of exceptionally keen intellect, and despite his long seclusion, capable of broad sympathy. In the sequel he proved to be not the son of the old fanatic Behar Asor and with only a slight tinge of Hindoo blood. His mother, estranged from her husband under the belief that it was he who had wronged the Rajah, had chosen to throw herself on the mercy of a people to whom she was allied by blood, and in the confusion of the last attack she had escaped unnoticed. This child, the son of her soldier husband, born six months after her captivity, had been taken from her and adopted by the Rajah, who conceived the truly Oriental revenge of training him for the one purpose of carrying out his vengeance on his own people; and history very nearly repeated itself, for at first nature proves stronger than nurture, and though believing himself to be of a pure strain of Hindu, Nehal Singh answers the call of the blood and when the occasion is brought about he meets the English residents as brothers and equals, much to their disgust. His honest straightforwardness is made the excuse for boorish contempt and covert references to "tar-worship," and as has happened since the beginning of time, this carefully secluded youth falls victim to the first adventuress who crosses his path and is made a tool of unscrupulous speculators, until he, too, revolts and determines to drive every man and woman of English blood beyond the borders of his kingdom. The characters, one might almost say, are old acquaintances. There is Colonel Carmichael, commander at the station, an old Indian fighter who is, from the first, opposed to any scheme for drawing the young Rajah from his seclusion, and there is Mrs. Carmichael, fitting wife for the Colonel, his able lieutenant. The Carys, mother and daughter, are of the adventuress type, actuated this time not by desire of pecuniary gain but by determination to win and hold social position and by any means whatever to keep buried their unsavory past history. John Stafford, Captain, is the son of one of the last victims of the old uprising, and Lois Caruthers, a ward of the Carmichaels, is the adopted child of another, they three being united in a fruitless opposition to any exploitation of the young Rajah. Adam Nicholson is the ideal Englishman in command in India, one who does not assume that his white blood gives him either omnipotence or omniscience but recognizing that difference is not necessarily inferiority. Beyond these principal figures stands a background of missionaries, sporting army officers, spoiled children of subordinates, the frivolous women always to be found in an environment where the first occupation is the killing of time, and the sinister figure of the fanatic old rajah Behar Asor, a shadow behind the curtain. The interest lies as much in the conflict of race characteristics as in the incidents, the struggle of Nehal Singh's English blood against his Oriental training and the quick about-face of the Englishmen and women who, willing to profit in every way by the generosity of the young noble and the mean advantages they could take of him, while refusing to see in his bearing anything but impudent and conceited self assertion, yet, as soon as it is revealed to them that he is as English by birth as any of themselves, and entitled to a large fortune independent of his rank, are assiduous in paying court to his nobility of character. "The Native Born" deserves its place on the same shelf with Mrs. Steele's Indian novels and A. E. Mason's "Broken Road." A writer whose initial venture is so successful should go far. Some Good Verses

Robert J. Shores of East Orange, New Jersey, has put forth a modest little booklet, scarcely more than thirty pages, of verse, serious and otherwise, under the title "At Molekai and other Verse." If it is not conspicuously good it is far from reaching the other extreme and is in fact rather better than the majority of the magazine verses of the day. Evidently Mr. Shores does not take himself seriously. He could do better things if he were to set about them, or perhaps if the general public had a sufficient interest in poetry to furnish the inspiration. A fair specimen is furnished under the title

One Walks With Me

One walks with me through all days
And dogs my footsteps everywhere,
No kindly critic; he betrays
No love for me; the very air
Is charged with his reproach of me—
The man that I once thought to be.

One walks with me through all the years
And silently remarks my sins,
The dice, the cards, the cup that cheers;
And when that last long sleep begins—
I wonder—will he weep for me?
The man that I once thought to be?

INDIAN HEAD ROCK IN THOUSAND OAKS.

Prices and Terms

Owing to the fact that the Southern Pacific's new electric interurban ferry system will not be running to Thousand Oaks until early spring we cannot offer these homesites today at the price they will be worth when the trains start.

Thousand Oaks villa homesites are being offered right now at $25 to $35 the front foot, and at terms never before offered on similar high-class property in this section of the State. We can't say what the prices will be when the electric trains begin running.

Our terms are very reasonable: One-tenth down and 1 per cent a month with no interest nor taxes for two years; and, in case of death your money will be refunded plus 6 per cent interest.

These terms make it possible for anybody to start paying on a homesite in this beautiful natural park.

By the time you have made eight or ten payments the road will be in and then you should be able to sell, if you wish, at a handsome profit.

Remember, Thousand Oaks is no farther from the University than Claremont, being within the mile and a half circle.

Drop us a line or telephone and we will mail you full information, price lists, etc. Or, drop into our Berkeley office and we will send you out in an automobile. You incur no obligations—we let the property speak for itself.

The News from Maine

In the Blaine-Cleveland campaign of 1884 Maine supplied the battle-cry for the Republican hosts. From Maine to California "Dirigo!" was the shibboleth of the followers of the white plumed Knight, and the Republicans were incessantly chanting the refrain "Have You Heard the News from Maine." Once more Opportunity with outstretched, rosy arms stands beaming on the Democracy, but this time Maine is not the stronghold of the G. O. P. The probability is that "Dirigo" will soon be blazoned on the banners of Democracy for the news from Maine is inspiring not to the house once more divided against itself but to the party that seems to be on the point of getting together and claiming the spoils of victory. Maine has furnished the keynote for the grand democratic symphony. The fight was waged in that State for economy in the administration of our government. We have been conserving everything but the coin of the realm. That we have been spending like drunken sailors while devising scheme to promote the welfare of posterity. President Taft has called attention to the criminal extravagance of our government, but his voice has not been heard. It has been lost amid the clamors of the men who threw our money to the birds, the men who would make paramount for the moment the issue of the new nationalism conceived and sponsored by the noisiest of all our vociferous tribunes. Now that the Republicans have stolen all the old stage thunder of the Bryaniac democracy it is only fair to vouchsafe the convalescent disciples of Jefferson the privilege of utilizing to advantage the issue discovered by the Republican President and tabooed by his followers.

Dubious Authority

"City Engineer Manson," says the Examiner, "is authority for the statement that nearly $100,000,000 worth of power and water development has been carried through in this State on the faith of such permits as the city has secured for Hetch-Hetchy." And the Examiner, one of the most sceptical of journals, accepts this authority without question, and assures the people that "they should feel no concern over the declaration of Mayor McCarthy that the Hetch-Hetchy permit is 'not worth the paper it is written on.'" The Examiner argues that if big financiers have risked their money on the scratch of a pen the taxpayers of San Francisco should have no hesitation in following their example. Before questioning the soundness of this argument it would be well to consider first whether City Engineer

Manson is an absolutely reliable authority. The Examiner apparently so regards him. At least it so regards him for the purpose of the argument. But it might add greatly to the cogency of the argument to extinguish all doubt as to the truth of Mr. Manson's assertion. If big financiers have spent $100,000,000 in developing properties to which they had no better title than that which a Secretary of the Interior can give it will doubtless be an easy matter to verify what Mr. Manson has said. Let us have the names of a few of the big financiers. And meanwhile let us proceed with a little more caution than we have exercised in the past.

The Logic of Roosevelt's Position

One of Colonel Roosevelt's critics views with astonishment his advice to the people of New Mexico and Arizona. Speaking at Pueblo he said: "There is one point on which I would like to advise the people of New Mexico and Arizona, and that is to make their Constitutions easy of amendment at any time when the people feel they should be amended." Colonel Roosevelt's critic solemnly affirms that this view is decidedly at variance with the opinions of "the ablest constitutional lawyers and leading text writers." Which is quite true; but what of it? The Colonel's view is at variance also with the opinion of every philosopher versed in the science of government of whom we have any knowledge. It is at variance also with one of the universally acknowledged principles of government. That the most changeable of governments is the worst is a proposition which no statesman before Roosevelt's time ever disputed. But the Colonel's conception of government, or at least the one he affects, as everybody should know by this time, is unique. And there is less reason to be astonished that he should recommend a Constitution of the kind that can be easily tinkered than that he should advise the adoption of a Constitution at all. For the Colonel, as we must all be aware, is impatient of everything that savors of constitutional restraint. His idea of government is symbolized in the big stick which is a poetical epithet descriptive of a dictatorship, for which the people as a result of their being artfully suggestionized seem to be rapidly developing an irresistible enthusiasm. He has reached a point at which he thinks it hardly necessary longer to dissemble. At Osawatimie he announced that while he believed in "playing according to the rules of the game" he was "in favor of changing the rules." The rules which he alluded to are those embodied in the Constitution, an instrument that he regards as obnoxious because of its incompatibility with the big stick. So, while he is willing to make a concession to people who are still influenced by a superstitious reverence for constitutional government, while in other words he is willing to have an ostensible Constitution, he will insist that it be so constructed as to be amenable to the higher authority of the man who wishes to do things and invariably knows what's right. Now in view of this attitude toward government there is no occasion for astonishment at the advice given to the people of Arizona and New Mexico.

Changing the Rules

This question of the advisability of rendering a Constitution easily susceptible of amendment will doubtless become the subject of much serious discussion now that the most popular of our half-baked philosophers has announced his determination to change "the rules of the game." For whatever the Colonel adopts as one of his policies becomes at once a matter of the gravest interest. And no matter how absurd or how anarchic it may appear to be his espousal of it raises it above suspicion in the public mind. So this new policy invites to sober and solemn reflection. Our first thought as we ponder it is, how greatly at variance are the judgments of Thomas Babington Macaulay and Theodore Roosevelt regarding this very Constitution of our country. Macaulay, bearing out the apprehension of Alexander Hamilton, said of our Constitution that it was "all sail and no anchor," and predicted that we should plunge headlong on the rocks as soon as we grew prosperous and some demagogue should rise in our midst to excite hatred against "vested interests." Now Mr. Roosevelt argues that our Constitution is all anchor and no sail, and he insists that we should cut the cable, put on more canvas and fill it with the variable breezes of that popular clamor that is always subject to the promptings of the hero of the hour. But Mr. Roosevelt in dissenting from Macaulay concurs with many gallant American patriots who pointed with pride to the hard and fast anchorage of the Constitution. Yet while they regarded its enduring quality as its chief virtue, Mr. Roosevelt regards it as an abomination. Great statesmen have said the Constitution was worthy of the highest praise if for no other reason than that it is not to be hastily amended. And that is one of the reasons why Mr. Roosevelt doesn't like it. But the men that praised the Constitution had an old-fashioned conception of the fundamental principles of government—old-fashioned in the sense that it existed among all peoples from the days of Cyrus of Persia down to the enlightened era of T. R. of the U. S. According to this conception government is a contrivance to provide for human wants, and "among those wants is to be reckoned the want of a sufficient restraint upon the passions." In addition to holding a conception of government radically different from Mr. Roosevelt's, our old-time statesmen also had a conception of the proper function of a Constitution which is radically different from our ex-President's. They believed that its proper function was the ordaining of the fundamental law, the prescribing of only general and comprehensive rules, not seeking to anticipate their application. Now Mr. Roosevelt does not differentiate constitutional law and legislation. He does not understand that one deals with the unchangeable, the other with the fluctuating; the one chiefly with principles, the other altogether with measures. Hence he does not appreciate the fact that the value of a constitution is in its permanence; the efficiency of statutes, in their capacity for modification as new problems arise. Hence, too, we find lurking among Mr. Roosevelt's policies the possibility of an early proposal for the application of the principle of the initiative and the referendum to the Constitution itself. The servants of the people, he says, must be made quickly responsive to the will of the people, but they cannot be responsive to popular whim, if they are to be subject to constitutional restraints. The rules of the game should be so changed that whenever the people appear to have been suggestionized, the man in the saddle who does the suggestionizing should be capable of quick action. Now nobody can authoritatively assert whether Mr. Roosevelt is wholly a humbug or partly a fanatic, but of this no enlightened man can have the least doubt,—that our Constitution, aside from the machinery of government which it establishes, and in respect to which it contemplates the possible necessity of amendment, prescribes not a single rule or restriction that is not absolutely and permanently essential to the maintenance of the principles on which our form of government is based, and that no legislative power is excluded which it would not be hazardous to exert. Nor can any enlightened man doubt that if our Constitution be periodically changed by the sovereign power of the people the result will be fatal to our system of government.

The Reticent Captain of Industry

Amid the current plethora of talk, clatter of words and confusion of tongues it is somewhat difficult to rise above the din of the jawsmiths and catch the small voice of the man who has something to say. So great is the uproar produced by the exhaustless magazines of sound footing it across country and splitting the ears of us that President Ripley has been barely able to get a hearing. President Ripley has been talking on a subject about which he is perhaps better informed than the average garrulous politician who has been preoccupied all his life with the mending of his fences and the conciliating of his constituents. He has been talking about railroads and refuting with facts, accessible to anybody that cares to examine them, the arguments of Senator Cummins and other dealers in wholesale misrepresentation. Though President Ripley did not choose an opportune time in which to make himself heard he is, nevertheless, to be commended for rendering a public service. We hope to see him render more of the same kind, and to see his example followed by others, equally competent to supply the public with valuable information. It would be well for the country if it became a common practice among men qualified as experts in matters of vital public interest to spend some of their time in the field of controversy. This country is governed rather by public opinion than by law, and public opinion is at the mercy of unscrupulous and blind leaders of the blind—sordid job-chasers, half-educated college professors and the bawds of journalism. And all the while questions which it is of the utmost importance to have clearly resolved are multiplying rapidly. The nearer we approach a market democracy the more vitally essential it becomes for us to have public questions discussed by men competent to spread the light. But these competent ones have been holding themselves aloof, and permitting the incompetent to mislead the public. And though this is the day and generation of the specialist, though in almost every field of activity the specialist is supreme, we are being governed on the principle that the politician is a jack-of-all-trades in whose judgment we may repose absolute confidence. For this state of affairs the men who manage our great industrial enterprises are to blame. With their acquiescence the politicians have been indulged to their hearts' content. They are the men who are qualified to give the demagogues effective opposition, and to do so they must enter the field of controversy. Whatever ill influence is produced by demagogues cannot long continue if they be opposed with that superior advantage which is always on the side of truth. Given a monopoly of the public ear for many years they have utilized their advantage to the injury of the men who have held their tongue. By magnifying evils, generating suspicions agreeable to the envious, dwelling exclusively on abuses, and extenuating nothing they have completely dislocated our conceptions of right and wrong. As a consequence the man who is burdened with the responsibility of making a corporation produce dividends can no longer in justice to the stockholders give himself over wholly to the demoralizing pursuit of attending strictly to business. It is fast becoming his most important duty to keep his eye on the artful politician who is cultivating socialistic ideas in the public mind along with the mischievous notion that power is synonymous with right. So if he is not to be moved by motives of public interest he should be moved by concern for private interests. Let him emerge therefore from his private office and get in touch with the sovereign people. They'll listen to him. With truth on his side he will have no difficulty in confounding the pot-house politicians who are in the business of governing us because they find it a source of income and are unfit for anything else.

Insurgent Poison

So far the insurgents have not openly questioned the integrity of President Taft. They have not the courage nor the candor to do that. But they are doing what is worse: they are impugning the motives of everybody who is in sympathy with him; they are undermining public confidence in him by treating as trivial every principle that he promulgates, by applauding everybody whose conduct he has censured and traducing everybody whom he has exalted. In other words President Taft's usefulness as a leader of his party and his efficiency as the Chief Magistrate of his country are being insidiously impaired by subtle subterranean methods of detraction. He is being destroyed by a slow poison artfully administered through a devious tube. Ever since he pronounced L. R. Glavis an arrant rogue, affirming that this pet of Pinchot's was unworthy of credence and that he had concealed evidence for the purpose of facilitating the assassination of Secretary Ballinger's character, the insurgents and their organs have pictured the miscreant as a martyr to the cause of civic purity. Most of their charges against Ballinger are based on the testimony of the man whom the President caught practicing a mean and cruel deception, and those which are said to have been proved have nothing to support them but the oath of Glavis. And now though Ballinger is pronounced guilty by a minority of the committee appointed to investigate him the organs of insurgency affect to believe that his guilt is established. Now it is obvious that if Ballinger is what the insurgents say he is, responsibility for him must rest on President Taft, and President Taft must be regarded either as a very obtuse person or a faithless official inasmuch as he has retained as a member of his Cabinet an individual transparent and shameless in his dishonesty. By way of further illustration of the methods of the President's detractors let us consider current comment on the subject of conservation. At St. Paul President Taft said that an important question to be solved was whether conservation should be a matter of State or Federal jurisdiction. In his opinion the question was deserving the sober reflection; it was not to be decided offhand. The very next day after the utterance of these views along came Colonel Roosevelt, and apparently with no intention of criticising Mr. Taft he took occasion to discuss the question of Federal and State control. With his customary impetuosity he settled it on the spot. Furthermore he broadly intimated that in his judgment nobody could sincerely question the desirability of empowering the national government to carry out the conservation policy. Promptly the insurgent organs took their cue from the Prophet of the true faith. From them we learn that everybody who has any learning toward the principle of State control is an enemy of the people and a friend of the predatory special interests. Discreetly they refrain from impugning the President's attitude, but the inference is hardly to be avoided. Nevertheless it cannot be said that they are blackening the character of Mr. Taft. The fact is they are only flecking it with innuendos. Meanwhile the President is holding his peace. Is he unconscious of the machinations of his enemies? We cannot believe that his perceptive faculties are so dull. Nor are we disposed to attribute his conciliatory manner or his wonderful patience to moral cowardice.

Perspective Impressions

What happened in Maine is somewhat more significant than what happened in Kansas and Wisconsin.

The Colonel is rapidly educating us up to appreciation of the right divine of mobs to govern wrong.

Now that we know Mr. Chanler we are inclined to think that the price Cavalieri charged him was not exorbitant.

The morals of Chinatown are again being improved by a tong war. The highbinders that reduce the number of men by whom our police are debauched are militant moral agents of a high order.

If the people are to rule why should they have a short ballot? The prevailing sentiment appears to be in favor of an endless ballot and a continuous performance at the polls. The short ballot is an invention of the plutocracy.

Ballinger may be all that his enemies assert and yet be reckoned somewhat more decent than the minority members of the investigating committee.

After being snubbed by the Mayor of Milwaukee T. R. took a hand at the game himself, calling all the world to witness that he would not dine with Senator Lorimer. Then he went into Ohio and embraced Boss Cox without losing an iota of his self-respect.

At Mrs. Carolan's Salon

Wherein a Feeble Effort is Made to Anticipate the Sort of Improving Conversation which Will Be Indulged in when Our Society Leader Introduces the Famous French Institution in San Francisco

By Edward F. O'Day

It is easy to imagine the excitement which will pervade our smartest and most intellectual society—for, though this may not be generally known, the two adjectives are really interchangeable—when Mrs. Francis Carolan returns to this city from Europe. This excitement will have nothing to do with Mrs. Carolan's undisputed importance as a social dictatrix; it will in nowise concern the dances which she will attend, the fashions which she will approve or the social newcomers to whom she will vouchsafe recognition. It will be purely a mental excitement, for Mrs. Carolan will return to stimulate intellectual activity in society, to re-establish the reign of the bluestocking, to lift polite intercourse above the unsatisfactory level whereon it has hitherto proceeded. Mrs. Carolan, be it known, is going to restore the glories of the French salon. She is going to constitute herself the pioneer of western culture by giving us the great Parisian institution which has never been successfully transplanted before. As French literary history records the brilliant circles over which Madame de Stael, Madame Recamier, Madame Roland, Madame Vigée Le Brun and other witty Frenchwomen presided, so California literary history will have a laudatory chapter for the salon of Mrs. Carolan. With the return of Mrs. Carolan California will begin to have two intellectual centers, Carmel and San Francisco and some future historian, paraphrasing George Eliot's reference to the Parisian salons will write: "The most indisputable source of feminine culture and development in San Francisco was the influence of Mrs. Carolan's salon."

My authority for the statement that Mrs. Carolan is to revolutionize social intercourse consists of the declarations made to that effect before she departed for Europe and a very interesting paragraph published in last Sunday's Chronicle which announced that a Shakespearian recital to be given by Mr. Marshall Darrach under the auspices of a number of distinguished patronesses would "inaugurate a new phase of social life in San Francisco." Continuing the Chronicle said: "The idea was suggested last year by Mrs. Francis Carolan who, of all the women in local society is perhaps best qualified to dictate as to intellectual innovations, and it is a matter of regret that her absence in Europe will prevent her active and intelligent participation in a plan of social entertainment which she advocated so strongly." It is evident that society will not enter definitely upon this new phase until Mrs. Carolan returns. In her absence the salon will linger in the experimental stage.

Let us take the liberty of imagining ourselves at one of the symposia over which Mrs. Carolan is going to preside. Let us suppose that from among our cultured smartsetters there are present, besides the Recamier of San Francisco, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Miss Jennie Crocker, Mr. Edward Greenway and Mr. Walter Hobart. Without presuming to intrude too much on the privacy of the thoughts of these highly cultivated ladies and gentlemen, is it not likely that the conversation will be something like this:

Mrs. Carolan: You are doubtless aware, Mr. Greenway, having so lately returned from abroad, that at last woman is coming into her own. Mrs. Pankhurst assured me of this fact in London and Mrs. Belmont told me the same thing in New York.

Mr. Greenway: My dear Mrs. Carolan, I am gratified at this most interesting intelligence. At the same time I had not noticed any difference. The members of your charming sex whom I met abroad seemed very much the same as those I left at home. Still I had not the honor of meeting Mrs. Pankhurst. Is she important socially?

Mrs. Martin: Isn't she the lady who chained herself to the railing of the prime minister's office? No wonder you didn't meet her, Mr. Greenway. You wouldn't want to meet me, I suppose, if I changed myself in front of Mayor McCarthy's office and I wouldn't blame you. Imagine me marching up and down Market street with a transparency, "Votes for Women."

Mr. Greenway: Mrs. Martin, you make me shudder. I have no sympathy for suffragettes. Who was it said, "Let me rear the children of a nation and I care not who makes its laws?"

Mr. Hobart: Your quotation is slightly inaccurate, Ned. "Let me write the songs of a nation," was the way it was put. And of course no woman ever did that.

Miss Crocker: Why Walter, I'm surprised. Have you forgotten Sappho?

Mr. Greenway: Who that saw the Nethersole in the part could ever forget her?

Miss Crocker: I am speaking of Lesbian Sappho who lived twenty-five centuries ago. She was the greatest poet of all times.

Mr. Hobart: Draw it mild, Jennie!

Miss Crocker: But she was! Tennyson calls her "the poet" and Swinburne says that no man can come close to her in poetry. All the ancient writers said the same thing. I could cite Plato and Aristotle and Plutarch and Longinus and many others, Greek and Latin.

Mrs. Martin: Was she a respectable young lady?

Miss Crocker: She wrote of love and committed suicide when her lover deserted her.

Mrs. Carolan: I have heard Mrs. Pat Campbell speak of her. She was very beautiful, was she not?

Miss Crocker: Swinburne speaks of "The small dark body's Lesbian loveliness
That held the fire eternal."

Mr. Greenway: When I was in Paris I met a queer chap named Marcel Prevost who insisted that beauty was going out of fashion.

Mrs. Carolan: Mrs. Pankhurst would be delighted to hear that.

Miss Crocker: And yet most of the great women have been very beautiful. Aspasia was beautiful and she helped to rule Athens. Dido was beautiful and she founded Carthage. The Queen of the Amazons who would have no men in her dominions was so beautiful that Alexander the Great fell head over heels in love with her.

Mrs. Carolan: My dear, those women all lived a long time ago and they were weak creatures, always falling in love. Did not Dido commit suicide like Sappho? Mrs. Pankhurst, like Monsieur Prevost, does not think much of beauty. She says that what women need nowadays is strength.

Mr. Hobart: Ever read that amazing German fellow, Schopenhauer? Next to polo and boxing I love those German philosophers. Schopenhauer doesn't agree with you. He says that you have only to look at the way in which woman is formed to see that she is not meant to undergo great labor, whether of the mind or of the body. Max Stirner and Otto Weininger go even further than that.

Miss Crocker: They never met my dear friend Tommy Sears. She can undergo great labor. You remember that she even outwalked my brother. The only person in history fit to be compared with her is Alcibiades. I read somewhere that when he was in Ionia he was gayer than the Ionians; that in Thebes he was a better athlete than the Boeotians; in Thessaly a better horseman than the Thessalians; and in Sparta braver than the Lacedaemonians. Almost the same words could be applied to Eleanor in San Francisco, Newport and Boston. She is a super-woman!

Mrs. Martin: My dear, she won't be a super-woman till she marries. It is by marrying and making some good man happy that woman comes into her own. I pity Mrs. Pankhurst's husband if she has one. And I would pity the man who married Sappho. With all her fine poetry she must have been a flighty woman. Talking of poets there is only one that I like better than dear old Tom Moore and that is Byron. He had the right idea when he wrote:

"The very first
Of human life must spring from woman's breast,
Your first small words are taught you from her lips,
Your first tears quenched by her, and your last sighs

Too often breathed out in a woman's hearing,
When men have shrunk from the ignoble care
Of watching the last hour of him who led them."

I venture to say that your brother Templeton is not thinking much about woman coming into her own. He and Miss Irwin are willing to leave that to Mrs. Pankhurst and Mrs. Belmont. Mr. Hobart agrees with me, I'm sure. Don't be offended with my old fashioned notions, Mrs. Carolan. I've enjoyed your salon so much! But let us forget the Greeks and the poets and the suffragettes for a moment while Mr. Greenway tells us about his plans for the season.

Mrs. Carolan and Miss Crocker (together): Yes, Mr. Greenway, please do!

Mr. Hobart: These salons have nothing in common with saloons—they make one confoundedly thirsty. Waiter!!

Mrs. Martin: Thank heaven, we are getting back to terra firma!

"My brother has just written a poem which he thinks will outlive him," said the man in the newspaper office.

"It certainly will if he brings it in here!" said the fighting editor.

Fantastic Fables

By Ambrose Bierce

(Though written and published many years ago and now out of print the amiable satire of these fables remains as a mirror clean of surface wherein beholders may discover everybody's face but their own.—Editor Town Talk.)

The Moral Principle and the Material Interest

A Moral Principle met a Material Interest on a bridge wide enough for but one.

"Down, you base thing!" thundered the Moral Principle, "and let me pass over you!"

The Material Interest merely looked in the other's eyes without saying anything.

"Ah," said the Moral Principle, hesitatingly, "let us draw lots to see which shall retire till the other has crossed."

The Material Interest maintained an unbroken silence and an unwavering stare.

"In order to avoid a conflict," the Moral Principle resumed, somewhat uneasily, "I shall myself lie down and let you walk over me."

Then the Material Interest found a tongue, and by a strange coincidence it was its own tongue. "I don't think you are very good walking," it said. "I am a little particular about what I have underfoot. Suppose you get off into the water."

It occurred that way.

The Blotted Escutcheon and the Soiled Ermine

A Blotted Escutcheon, rising to a question of privilege, said:

"Mr. Speaker, I wish to hurl back an allegation and explain that the spots upon me are the natural markings of one who is a direct descendant of the sun and a spotted fawn. They come of no accident of character, but inhere in the divine order and constitution of things."

When the Blotted Escutcheon had resumed his seat a Soiled Ermine rose and said:

"Mr. Speaker, I have heard with profound attention and entire approval the explanation of the honorable member, and wish to offer a few remarks on my own behalf. I, too, have been foully calumniated by our ancient enemy, the Infamous Falsehood, and I wish to point out that I am made of the fur of the Mustela maculata, which is dirty from birth."

The Moral Sentiment

A Pugilist met the Moral Sentiment of the Community, who was carrying a hat-box. "What have you in the hat-box, my friend?" inquired the Pugilist.

"A new frown," was the answer. "I am bringing it from the frowner—the one over there with the gilded steeple."

"And what are you going to do with the nice new frown?" the Pugilist asked.

"Put down pugilism—if I have to wear it night and day," said the Moral Sentiment of the Community, sternly.

"That's right," said the Pugilist, "that is right, my good friend; if pugilism had been put down yesterday, I wouldn't have this kind of a Nose today. I had a rattling hot fight last evening with—"

"Is that so?" cried the Moral Sentiment of the Community, with sudden animation. "Which licked? Sit down here on the hat-box and tell me all about it!"

The Christian Serpent

A Rattlesnake came home to his brood and said: "My children, gather about and receive your father's last blessing, and see how a Christian dies."

"What ails you, Father?" asked the Small Snakes.

"I have been bitten by the editor of a partisan journal," was the reply, accompanied by the ominous death-rattle.

Alarm and Pride

"Good-morning, my friend," said Alarm to Pride; "how are you this morning?"

"Very tired," replied Pride, seating himself on a stone by the wayside and mopping his steaming brow. "The politicians are wearing me out by pointing to their dirty records with me, when they could as well use a stick."

Alarm sighed sympathetically, and said:

"It is pretty much the same way here. Instead of using an opera-glass they view the acts of their opponents with me!"

As these patient drudges were mingling their tears, they were notified that they must go on duty again, for one of the political parties had nominated a thief and was about to hold a gratification meeting.

A Causeway

A Rich Woman having returned from abroad disembarked at the foot of Kneedeep Street, and was about to walk to her hotel through the mud.

"Madam," said a Policeman, "I cannot permit you to do that; you would soil your shoes and stockings."

"Oh, that is of no importance, really," replied the Rich Woman, with a cheerful smile.

"But, madam, it is needless; from the wharf to the hotel, as you observe, extends an unbroken line of prostrate newspapermen who crave the honor of having you walk upon them."

"In that case," she said, seating herself in a doorway and unlocking her satchel, "I shall have to put on my rubber boots."

A Prophet of Evil

An Undertaker Who Was a Member of a Trust saw a Man Leaning on a Spade, and asked him why he was not at work.

"Because," said the Man Leaning on a Spade, "I belong to the Gravediggers' National Extortion Society, and we have decided to limit the production of graves and get more money for the reduced output. We have a corner in graves and propose to work it to the best advantage."

"My friend," said the Undertaker Who Was a Member of a Trust, "this is a most hateful and injurious scheme. If people cannot be assured of graves, I fear they will no longer die, and the best interests of civilization will wither like a frosted leaf."

And blowing his eyes upon his handkerchief, he walked away lamenting.

A Harmless Visitor

At a meeting of the Golden League of Mystery a Woman was discovered, writing in a notebook. A member directed the attention of the Superb High Chairman to her, and she was asked to explain her presence there, and what she was doing.

"I came in for my own pleasure and instruction," she said, "and was so struck by the wisdom of the speakers that I could not help making a few notes."

"Madam," said the Superb High Chairman, "we have no objection to visitors if they will pledge themselves not to publish anything they hear. Are you—on your honor as a lady, now, madam—are you not connected with some newspaper?"

"Good gracious, no!" cried the Woman, earnestly. "Why, sir, I am an officer of the Women's Press Association!"

She was permitted to remain, and presented with resolutions of apology.

At Large—One Temper

A Turbulent Person was brought before a Judge to be tried for an assault with intent to commit murder, and it was proved that he had been variously obstreperous without apparent provocation, had affected the peripheries of several luckless fellow-citizens with the trunk of a small tree, and subsequently cleaned out the town. While trying to palliate these misdeeds, the defendant's Attorney turned suddenly to the Judge, saying:

"Did your Honor ever lose your temper?"

"I fine you twenty-five dollars for contempt of court!" roared the Judge, in wrath. "How dare you mention the loss of my temper in connection with this case?"

After a moment's silence the Attorney said, meekly:

"I thought my client might perhaps have found it."

At the Pole

After a great expenditure of life and treasure a Daring Explorer had succeeded in reaching the North Pole, when he was approached by a Native Galeut who lived there.

"Good moring," said the Native Galeut. "I'm very glad to see you, but why did you come here?"

"Glory," said the Daring Explorer, curtly.

"Yes, yes, I know," the other persisted; "but of what benefit to man is your discovery? To what truths does it give access which were inaccessible before?—facts, I mean, having a scientific value?"

"I'll be Tom scatted if I know," the great man replied, frankly; "you will have to ask the Scientist of the Expedition."

But the Scientist of the Expedition explained that he had been so engrossed with the care of his instruments and the study of his tables that he had found no time to think of it.

Six and One

The Committee on Gerrymander worked late, drawing intricate lines on a map of the State, and being weary sought repose in a game of poker. At the close of the game the six Republican members were bankrupt and the single Democrat had all the money. On the next day, when the Committee was called to order for business, one of the luckless six mounted his legs, and said:

"Mr. Chairman, before we bend to our noble task of purifying politics, in the interest of good government I wish to say a word of the untoward events of last evening. If my memory serves me the disasters which overtook the Majority of this honorable body always befell when it was the Minority's deal. It is my solemn conviction, Mr. Chairman, and to its affirmation I pledge my life, my fortune, and my sacred honor, that that wicked and unscrupulous Minority restricted the cards!"

The Eligible Son-in-Law

A Truly Pious Person who conducted a savings bank and let money to his sisters and his cousins and his aunts of both sexes, was approached by a Tatterdemalion, who applied for a loan of one hundred thousand dollars.

"What security have you to offer?" asked the Truly Pious Person.

"The best in the world," the applicant replied, confidentially; "I am about to become your son-in-law."

"That would indeed be gilt-edged," said the banker, gravely; "but what claim have you to the hand of my daughter?"

"One that cannot be lightly denied," said the Tatterdemalion. "I am about to become worth one hundred thousand dollars."

Unable to detect a weak point in his scheme of mutual advantage, the financier gave the promoter in disguise an order for the money, and wrote a note to his wife directing her to count out the girl.

At Castle Riedenheim

By Marie Von Bunsen (From the German)

The preparation of Christmas presents had been interrupted by tea, which was the only English custom that had penetrated to the quiet seclusion of Castle Riedenheim. In the great room, furnished in the pseudo-Gothic style of 1840, the three faded countesses, daughters to Aunt Betty, otherwise the Countess von Hilberg-Sachsungen, were admiring the noble park and terrace from one of the cosy window-seats in the thick walls.

The Dowager Countess von Hilberg-Dahnitz-Riedenheim, who had a kindly old face, a kindly black silk, and a kindly old-fashioned brooch, was tempting the Princess Ernestine. "Another cup, my dear Ernestine? You might venture on a third after your journey."

The princess, unmarried, in the late forties, distinguished rather than beautiful in appearance, considered the temptation. "Thank you, my dear Pauline," she returned. "I am just from the baths and salad and sandals, and interrupt my treatment only for this occasion."

Aunt Betty and the three faded daughters chorused: "It was so sweet of you to come! We are so delighted to see you!"

From their joyous unanimity it may be suspected that Aunt Betty was in straightened circumstances. The chairs, in violet velvet, the centre-table with its elaborate covering and its editions de luxe, were of more interest to her, as she dealt smiles about the room, than were the family portraits. Aunt Betty, Countess von Hilberg-Sachsungen, had more ancestors and names than pseudo-Gothic furniture.

The princess replied to the welcoming chorus: "I wouldn't have missed it for anything. I wanted to be here for Miss Bella's arrival."

As the dowager merely sighed in reply, the princess continued anxiously: "Why, Pauline, you wrote as though you were pleased with the engagement!"

"Oh, so I am," returned the dowager hastily. "Eberhard is so much in love with her, and from the American point of view the Simpkins must be a very respectable family—and a dowry of six million marks is not to be despised, nowadays. But she is so foreign—though she speaks very good German, to be sure. Then, too, who knows how we shall get along?"

The princess had traveled widely and knew human nature. She suggested, with an excellent imitation of naivete, to Miss Marion: "Well, you, dear Miss Marion, will feel quite at home with her, of course, since the English and Americans are so much alike."

Miss Marion Eversley was English—very English. Tall, thin, over thirty, poor and scholarly, she was almost as proud of her kinship to a lord as she was of her English blood. She colored with annoyance, but answered calmly: "We could scarcely be more unlike, your highness."

The dowager's only unmarried daughter, Elfrida, tall and of expressive, regular features, but rather shy and awkward, had listened to the response in anxiety. Leaving one of the richly carved chairs, she crossed to Miss Marion and kissed her on the shoulder caressingly: "But you'll be nice to the Simpkinses, won't you?"

"And what has the little one to say about her new sister-in-law?" asked the princess.

"Oh, she wrote me a charming letter," answered Elfrida. "And she has asked Eberhard all about me, and always sends me her love. I think she is very kind and she must be so pretty!"

While she was talking, Eberhard, Count von Hilberg-Dahnitz-Riedenheim, came in, dressed in the full uniform of the Guards. He was a man of twenty-eight, tall, fresh-looking and blond. The chorus greeted him with a wondering, "Why, Eberhard!"

Eberhard looked down at his uniform in some embarrassment. "Yes," he explained: "Bella insisted on it. She mentioned it in every letter. Of course, it's absurd, but—" He changed the subject suddenly, with, "Everything ready, mamma?"

A slender, exquisitely gowned, and still more exquisitely pretty young lady was driving up in a carriage. When she had been ushered in, she embraced the dowager with the utmost fervor.

Miss Bella Simpkins talked very fast. "I feel as if I had known you for years; as if I were really your daughter. I'm going to let you tyrannize over me dreadfully. I'm so proud of such a mother-in-law!" While the overpowered dowager was answering, "My dear Bella, you are heartily welcome," the American turned toward Elfrida.

"And this is little Elfrida! I know you from your photograph. How much you look like Eberhard, only—I beg your pardon—not so handsome. Isn't he a beauty? And the helmet with the eagle, isn't it lovely? Isn't he the very picture of a reigning Imperial Count Eberhard von Hilberg-Dahnitz-Riedenheim?"

The other ladies had rather shrunk at the last words, but the greetings continued with the utmost cordiality. Mrs. Simpkins, an elegant, white-haired personage, whose entrance had been rather obscured by Bella's, had something amiable to say to each one.

"My dear countess," said Mrs. Simpkins to the dowager, "you can't think how fine our reception was at the station. There were flags and wreaths, and the station-master's daughter handed us flowers and recited a poem of welcome. And then your magnificent blue and yellow livery!"

"It's the handsomest livery in the province!" chorused Aunt Betty and her daughters.

"Now I want to see everything!" said Bella, when the greetings were over. "I am delighted with Riedenheim. Eberhard was always talking about the 'dear old rookery.'"

While Aunt Betty and daughters were protesting against this belittling term, Bella was admiring the family portraits.

"Oh, what a splendid old field marshal!" she exclaimed. "And this powdered lady with the muff and greyhound! Who was she?"

"My husband's great-grandmother," explained the dowager. "She was a princess of Baden, of the Schwetsinger line."

Bella and her mother exchanged glances, and repeated as in a dream, "A princess of Baden!"

"Oh, we only have a few of the pictures down here," commented Eberhard. "Most of them are upstairs in the banquet-hall."

"Portraits and banquet-hall!" gasped Bella. "It's just like a novel!" She looked out over the courtyard and exclaimed: "Oh, how picturesque! Which is the oldest part?"

"The Roman tower," answered the dowager. "Most of the rest of the castle goes back to the time of Charlemagne. The almost uninhabitable part over there is fourteenth century, the time of the Minnesinger Eberhard von Riedenheim. This modern wing is only a hundred and fifty years old."

"It is all pretty old and dilapidated," commented Eberhard; but Bella merely smiled, thinking of her ample dowry.

"Such a great castle as this costs enormously to keep up," commenced the Greek chorus of Aunt Betty and daughters, but Eberhard gave them a warning look.

"I never remember seeing anything more picturesque!" said Bella. Eberhard kissed her hand, and they went off to see the park.

That night Eberhard kissed his mother's hand and said gaily: "Well, mamma?"

"Ah, my dear boy, she is a charming little thing!"

"And the mother-in-law isn't bad at all, is she? Doesn't affect to be youthful, and is so clever and entertaining. And what life Bella puts into everything! We really had a very pleasant evening," smiled Eberhard.

"Yes, she is extremely agreeable," said the dowager. "How much she knows, and how charmingly she tells a story!"

"Didn't I tell you so?" boasted Eberhard. With a kiss and a good night, he left the room.

"Did you know, dear, lovely mamma?"

Elfrida. "We haven't anything to compare with them!"

"The maid described their toilet things to me," sighed the dowager. "The mother's toilet articles are of beaten silver, and the daughter's of gold. The emeralds Bella wore this evening are part of the French crown jewels that were sold lately and the diamond shoe-buckles are real and belonged to Marie Antoinette. And they were really very nice to everyone, even to Aunt Betty and the superintendent and his wife. Don't be offended, but your friend Miss Marion might take example by them."

"Marion is so straightforward," apologized Elfrida. "She can't endure anything like insincerity or toadyism, you know."

"Yes, I know," sighed the dowager. "But relatives, especially when they have had misfortunes—it was really delightful to see how pleased with everything Bella was. She was especially nice to me. Only, I wish she'd be a little more polite to her mother!"

"Yes, what do you think she said to me?" said Elfrida, in a shocked tone. "She said that 'Mamma, take her all in all, is quite presentable; and papa is nice, but rather common! Perhaps she doesn't mean anything by it.'"

"And if she only would not cross her legs!" sighed the dowager again. "I know that people do it, nowadays, and that Sibyl Fuchtenow, over whom all the officers of the Guard rave so, does it; but— And then if she could only get accustomed to people's titles! But when one remembers that she is an American and that her father sells gas stoves, she is really wonderful, after all!"

"Yes," sighed Elfrida reminiscently, "she is perfectly lovely. Good night, mother."

Breakfast in the beech arbor was over at nine o'clock the next morning. The princess, Mrs. Simpkins, Miss Marion, Elfrida and Aunt Betty sat around the table, talking and working. The dowager came to them with the remark:

"I have just been in to see our dear Bella. She has had her tea, is very cheerful and is going to get up soon."

Exclaimed Aunt Betty, in a tone of the deepest sympathy: "Ah, my dear Mrs. Simpkins, I hope our charming Bella is not ill?"

"Oh, no, not at all, but she is tired from yesterday. We Americans all have nervous prostration. I fancy that in Germany, where life is so quiet and regular, you do not know what that means."

"I have known a good many Americans," said the princess. "Dresden is swarming with them."

"Oh, don't confuse us with the ordinary Americans," said Mrs. Simpkins, coloring with vexation. "We can't understand how people in the best European society will form friendships with people whom we should never know at home—who could never get into our set."

"But I thought you were republicans and did not recognize any distinctions of class!"

"We are far more exclusive than you Europeans. Just because there are no outward distinctions, we attach all the more importance to good breeding, which one finds almost exclusively among the old families."

An Appreciation of Bierce

Editor Town Talk—Dear Sir: Please permit me to add a few observations to those made by the Spectator last week with reference to Ambrose Bierce. With what the Spectator has said I quite agree, but it occurs to me that it may be somewhat misleading to suggest that Bierce is receiving the appreciation that he deserves. First editions of his works, it is true, command a premium, but that is not conclusive of a widespread realization of the magnitude of his genius. The truth is that Bierce is appreciated by the discerning few. And it would be most remarkable were it otherwise. Competent judges of literature have never been numerous in any age. Nor has the ability to appreciate genius ever been widely distributed. In past times the only men of letters who were respected formed a portion of that highly cultivated class who will always be in the minority, and to that class, and to that class only, they appealed. Nowadays so great is the spread of a little learning that almost everybody writes and there is nobody that doesn't read. The consequence is that many quacks are respected. They write down to the level of the mob for the very good reason that they cannot do otherwise, and the mob applauds. But the man of genius who writes over the heads of the mob is appreciated only by the few. Bierce is this man, and from what I have heard of him I judge that he is not at all displeased with the situation. He knows that with the exception of the position occupied by charlatans, a position due to the spread of superficial education, the limitations of the field of literature so far as the man of genius is concerned are as they always have been. In the days of Pericles, in the Rome of Augustus, in the Florence of the Medici, the man of genius was the pet only of the elect. The Elizabethan dramatists, though they depended for a living on the illiterate for whose amusement they catered, made themselves completely intelligible only to scholars. Each felt with pride that he represented a great art which had nothing in common with the multitude. Marlowe looked for the appreciation of Greene; Jonson for that of Shakespeare, and the great bard himself was always mindful of the critical discernment of "Rare Old Ben." It was the verdict of the Mermaid that counted. And so it is today. There are a few Mermaids were Bierce is worshipped. In the years to come when the mortal part of him is dust the common herd will know him as a classic. By that time so many men whose opinion is respected will have proclaimed his genius that the common herd will know the truth. But even then he will not be read by the multitude. They will keep him in their libraries just as now they keep Swift there and Pope and Juvenal and Horace, but they will not read him any oftener than they read any of the classic wits. They will keep him and they will read the slap-stick humorists of the hour. Meanwhile the average reader who knows what is great only from hearsay doesn't hear about Bierce chiefly for the reason that he is a satirist. It is the business of the satirist to lay about him and lash the fools and knaves, and he is always feared and hated just as Christ was feared and hated by the Pharisees, as Horace was feared and hated by the Stoics, as Pope was feared and hated by the men that he satirized in the Dunciad. The satirist's path to preferment is always obstructed as was that of the man who wrote the "Tale of a Tub." Swift had the power to elevate his friends, but to elevate himself was impossible. Because he scattered his terrible Greek fire over the sycophants of St. James's he was denied what he craved and could obtain nothing but exile to Ireland. And so with Bierce—the quacks of literature hate him and fear him because he has held them up to ridicule. What they would like to say about him they fear to say and so they keep silent. Perhaps when he is dead some Jeffrey or Oldham will have the courage to do what their prototypes did to the memory of Swift and Butler. And now Mr. Editor, though I have described Bierce as a satirist, do not suppose that I do not understand that he is something more. It would be more fitting to describe him as a man of letters. He is a great critic, a great essayist, a master of the short story, and better qualified to wear the bays than any other temperamental satirist with the exception of Byron and Pope. As a humorist he combines the qualities of Pope, Swift and Butler as one may learn by reading his Black Beetles, his Cobwebs and his Nuggets and Dust. Pope had little sense for the ludicrous aspects of life. Malignant ridicule was his forte, though he often winged with fancy a great and generous thought. Bierce is master of all the weapons of satire, and in addition he has Swift's and Butler's relish for buffoonery which he displays with all the elegance of a Pope

A Defense of Judge Dunne

Editor Town Talk—Dear Sir: I learn from the papers that Dr. Shumate is of the opinion that Judge Dunne is a paranoiac. This strikes me as in the nature of a glittering generality. I would suggest that Dr. Shumate become more specific. It is evident enough that Judge Dunne's mind is not what it should be considering the very responsible position that he holds. And such being the case he should be made the subject of serious inquiry. Many years ago it was discovered that Judge Clough was insane, and he was removed from the bench to an asylum. It would be very sad were this experience repeated. But it would be sadder still were we to keep a lunatic on the bench. Now with all due respect to the judgment of Dr. Shumate, of whom it is not to be supposed that he would lightly and without strong conviction pass so serious a professional judgment as that which he has passed on Judge Dunne, I am inclined to fear that an injustice might be done were we to assume that there is anything abnormal in the jurist's mental condition. What appears to be a mental disorder is often nothing more than a condition of mind un-sued to the business in hand. A man may be abnormal when compared with other men, but absolutely normal when compared with himself. Lunacy is nothing more than a manifestation of acute eccentricity. If a polite and dignified banker were to behave in public like a zealous anarchist we should be justified in assuming that he had gone daft. But we should have no reason to assume that an anarchist was crazy unless he were suddenly to act like a dignified and conservative banker. So with respect to Judge Dunne, the question to be answered is, Has he ceased to act like himself? He may appear to be an ass, but if stupidity has always been characteristic then it would be wrong to take the same action in his case that was taken in the case of Judge Clough. If the people elected a stupid judge to the bench who shall say that stupidity was not the quality they wanted? I have known Judge Dunne for many years, and I can conscientiously testify that in his evolution from what he was to what he is nothing has occurred to occasion alarm. Relatively, he is absolutely normal. Of course certain minor eccentricities may be noted, but they are precisely what might have been expected of a man of his calibre placed in his present environment. It is a well known fact that men of a certain temperament when they become criminal judges delight in suffering merely as suffering. Judge Jeffreys is a notable example. It is said there was a fiendish exultation in the way in which he pronounced a sentence, and that the imploring of the unfortunate seemed to titillate him voluptuously. But Judge Jeffreys was not a paranoiac. Long before he went on the bench he exhibited qualities that adumbrated the qualities of his later career.

A Rebuke from Oakland

Mr. Editor: In your heavy, labored way, and attempting, as usual, to show your erudition by luging in classical allusions, you say that Roosevelt's "platitudes" greatly disturb your ideas of appropriate addresses. Would you have formal orations in Latin or Greek? Dismal essays, abstruse scientific lectures—so appropriate, indeed, for an out-door talk to an average crowd? And, does any speaker, any time, anywhere, since the world began, ALWAYS indulge in oratorical outbursts worthy of preservation as literature? Isn't existence itself "commonplace"? You, with such vast learning and superior wisdom, dribbled weekly, breathe, eat, sleep, perform the functions of existence, like unto other billions of less knowledge—the common herd of humanity just about on a par with you in the commonplaces of existence; and the platitudes of right, truth, honor, etc., exist since civilization, and will, until time ends. I read Town Talk as a mental irritant. It never fails to get me into fighting mood.

Siftings from Many Sources

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over.

The Succession in Egypt

The fact that the Khedive of Egypt has been sojourning for a long time in Constantinople has brought to light a very interesting condition of affairs. There is a woman at the bottom of it. The Khedive's numerous visits to western Europe and his intercourse with foreign potentates have not only taught him the advantages of having a wife whom he can introduce into society, a thing which is contrary to Mohammedan custom, but have also filled him with the desire of being succeeded by the son of such a wife. The Khedive has such a wife in the Austrian countess whom he privately married last January. This countess had been at the Egyptian court for a long time and the Khedive cherished a passionate love for her. She became a convert to Mohammedanism before the marriage. But the countess is not the Khedivah for that title is borne by the wife who bears the Khedive his first male child. The Khedive does not like the Khedivah and does not want her son to succeed him. He hopes to have a son by his countess-bride and is moving heaven and earth to get the Sublime Porte to alter the law of succession in such a way that he may recognize that son as the heir to the throne and the mother as the real Khedivah.

Roosevelt Sees a Light

In his speech at Osawatimie, August 31, 1910, Colonel Roosevelt declared: "It is particularly important that all moneys received or expended for campaign purposes should be publicly accounted for not only after election but before election as well." This was not the stand which the Colonel took on September 27, 1908, when he wrote to William J. Bryan: "I emphatically approve of the publication of campaign expenses after the election. . . . You have shown by this letter of yours that if Mr. Harriman's contribution to the campaign fund of 1904 had been known before the election, you and your supporters would have endeavored to use the fact of its having been made as an insincere and untruthful argument. . . . No stronger argument against your proposition (i. e., for publication before election) has yet been advanced than this that you have unconsciously advanced." The New York Evening Post wonders whether the fact that Cortelyou and Bliss have got through collecting campaign contributions for Roosevelt has anything to do with this change of front.

An Editor for a Week

From Havana comes the news that after publishing a single issue of a new satirical weekly a Cuban editor has been shot and killed. The weekly was Chantecler and its editor was Juan Amer. The first issue contained a scurrilous article concerning a young woman prominent in Havana society. The name of Jose Pennino, a Liberal candidate for city councilman, was mentioned in the article. On the afternoon when the first number of Chantecler was published Pennino killed the editor.

Japan Fears Socialism

A movement is gathering strength in Japan which the old regime never dreamed of and which the new regime is doing its utmost to suppress. This is Socialism, the theoretical phase of which imported by returning Japanese students from abroad has brought in its wake the usual enemies of society in the shape of Anarchists and bomb throwers. The movement is fed from two chief sources, the student class and the laboring class. The breach between the rich and the poor is growing wider and wider with the advance of industrialism, the increased cost of living, with high taxes, and the placing of existence on a mere money basis. Feeling runs high between class and class. The Japanese Government does not object to Socialism in its economic phases, but only on account of its anti-dynastic trend. As to the former the Government itself offers a curious anomaly, for it is now in control of most of the railways of the empire, as well as several factories and other undertakings generally left to private enterprise. The Government's paternal attitude toward industry and private business generally can be regarded in no other light than that of a kind of Socialism. The Government has a monopoly of salt, tobacco, and camphor, and is now looking toward the silkworm industry. In addition to registering and inspecting as well as controlling many private enterprises the Government registers lawyers, physicians, societies, associations, including churches, hotels, theaters; in fact, all that cater to public demand. At the same time any suggestion of a belief in individualism, Socialism, which the Conservative press describes as the "white plague" on account of its origin, is rigorously suppressed.

The Spectator

The Parade of the Natives

The Native Son parade of last Friday broke all the endurance records. Five hours of marching and countermarching! 'Twas an achievement in the processional line never before equaled in this city. It is to be hoped that it will never be surpassed or even approximated. It is a question who were the more fatigued when it was all over—the paraders or the spectators. Probably the latter who suffered the discomfort of being confined so long to one spot. Everywhere there were complaints about the long halt, but it was not without its advantages. It gave every man in the parade an opportunity to enjoy at least one drink—and many of the women too. And surely the women needed stimulants. It was nothing less than criminal to allow them to plod hour after hour over that interminable line of march. I am positive that many of them must have been made seriously ill by the strain. And the little children too! When will our strange passion for parades be leavened with common sense?

Why the Parade Was Delayed

All sorts of explanations were passed from mouth to mouth accounting for the hour's delay in the parade. A popular one was that a live wire had to be cleared from the street. A less charitable explanation was that the Queen of the festival had insisted on partaking of luncheon. But the real reason was that Governor Gillett and James Rolph Jr. were not in the reviewing stand when the head of the parade swept by and the men in charge refused to allow it to proceed until they were found. As Rolph was at the Ferry while the Governor was also at some distant point the fatuous obstinacy of the marshals worked a great hardship on paraders and spectators. Of course neither the Governor nor Mr. Rolph was aware of the circumstance until it was called to their attention. Neither was a party to the unnecessary delay. The enthusiastic Natives simply made up their minds that the reviewing party should be complete and persisted for an hour.

Our Scanty Militia

Did you notice the miserable showing made by the National Guard in the parade? I counted just seven companies of militia which exhausts our strength although we are allowed sixteen. What is the matter with the militia? In the old days before the reorganization our National Guard was something to be proud of and yet the reorganization should have made the service much more attractive than previously. Apparently it has not. The National Guard is suffering from listlessness—or something worse. Personally I think it is something worse, namely the active enmity of union labor. If union labor were not so bitterly opposed to the National Guard hundreds of our sturdy young workmen would be glad to enroll themselves. But they dare not join the militia, despite the laws which protect them in this regard. In this connection it is worth while noting that the site for the new armory of the National Guard is at Fourteenth and Mission streets where the Southern Pacific Hospital used to be. The headquarters of our two big labor bodies, the Building Trades Council and the Labor Council, are at Fourteenth and Guerrero and Fourteenth and Valencia respectively. That is a densely populated district of workmen. In the event of a big strike it would be a hotbed of agitation. The proximity of the labor headquarters to the armory of the National Guard would then become a source of almost inevitable disorder. It would be easy to assemble a mob in Fourteenth street and overawe the militia—or attempt to overawe them. Strife would be the necessary outcome with loss of life and—who knows?—the burning of the armory. Such things are strictly within the possibilities of the next labor upheaval. The armory should have been located somewhere near the Presidio where the guns of Uncle Sam could protect it.

A Case in Point

I have said that the hostility of union labor is largely responsible for the scantiness of our National Guard. Let me detail a recent occurrence which is proof of this. In the city architect's office three young draughtsmen were members of the seventh company of Coast Artillery, N. G. C. It is unnecessary to give their names. When the militia was about to go into encampment at the Presidio in June these three young men applied to their superiors for permission to go along. The permission was granted by J. L. Fisher, the city architect. But before it was granted George Colmesnil who is chief assistant in Fisher's office told one of the three who is my authority, "You know how the municipal administration feels towards the National Guard. If you go to the encampment you will be taking the reins into your own hands." This same statement Colmesnil also made to Captain Ashleigh R. Farless of the seventh company. The three draughtsmen went to the Presidio for the week's maneuvers. Shortly after their return they were expelled from their positions. No reason was given them for their dismissal, but at least one of them was assured in writing by two of his superiors that his work had been entirely satisfactory. It may be urged that the three draughtsmen were dismissed because the work of the office had decreased. It is true that some time afterwards other draughtsmen were let out on that account. But only three men were dismissed on July 6 and all three of them had attended the National Guard encampment. Considering the remark made by Colmesnil there seems to be more than a coincidence here. Without desiring to pose as martyrs the three draughtsmen are convinced that they lost their positions because they belonged to the militia.

Kolb to Star in the East

I met Clarence Kolb of the defunct team of Kolb and Dill on Monday afternoon and learned that after a hurried trip to New York he had returned for two days to confer with his attorneys regarding the suit brought by Max Dill and was about to fly eastward again to be gone for three years. Ever since his break with Dill, which by the way was first announced in these columns, Kolb has been negotiating with the Schuberts and with Max Rogers of the former Rogers Brothers team of German comedians. By wire he received very flattering offers and when he went to New York to complete arrangements he was almost taken off his feet by the terms which he was able to make. As he showed me the contract signed by Lee Schubert, Max Rogers and himself I am able to vouch for his good fortune. Under the terms of the contract he and Rogers are to star together for two years with a joint salary during the first year of $750 a week and ten per cent of the profits which will be increased to fifty per cent if the net profits exceed $20,000. During the second year they are to receive a joint salary of $1,000 a week with the same arrangement of percentages. If the net profits for the second year exceed $40,000 Rogers and Kolb are to have the option of renewing the contract with the Schuberts for a third year. The two comedians are to start in Philadelphia with a $20,000 production of a musical farce which is now being prepared by Harry B. Smith whose name is so closely associated with that of De Koven and Aaron Hoffman who wrote "The Politicians" and some of the Roger Brothers shows. After a season in Philadelphia they will move to the Casino or Broadway Theater in New York.

Their Prospects are Good

Kolb tells me that Max Rogers has been looking for a team-mate ever since the death of his brother. Max was the smaller member of the famous team. He is not as tall as Max Dill so the contrast between the two members of the new team of Rogers and Kolb—a contrast which is indispensable in a team of German comedians—will be more accentuated than in any other team in the business. It seems that Lee Schubert is delighted with the prospect and declares that the coalition will result in the greatest mirth-provoking and financial success in low comedy. As none of the Schuberts is given to unsubstantial enthusiasm this dictum is very significant. Kolb is naturally pleased by the flattering terms which he has made and places a very sensible construction upon them. "They have put it squarely up to me to make good," he says, "and I am going to try my hardest to deliver the goods." Here's hoping sincerely that he will succeed.

The Death of Gebhardt

It will be a long time before the elder clubmen of New York and San Francisco exhaust their stock of stories about Freddie Gebhardt. A remarkable character he was but in nothing so remarkable as in the capacity he possessed for maintaining his reputation as a dead game sport, a man of invincible courage and an athlete of unusual prowess. San Franciscans who knew him in his heyday tell me that he never distinguished himself in any branch of athletics, that his courage was several times tested and found wanting and that his sportsmanship was not without an element of trickery. But all agree that he was a handsome man with unusual taste in dress and that he was shrewd enough to hide his deficiencies in other particulars from all but those who were on terms of intimacy with him. From which I infer that Freddie Gebhardt like so many other men in the public eye enjoyed what might be called a newspaper reputation, a reputation built on more or less legendary stories served up in print from time to time and polished as they were passed along. That he was a man of very defective education was called to the attention of the country when his valet brought suit against him and produced in court letters in which Freddie did violence to orthography by such spellings as "frute" for fruit and "chickin" for chicken. The fact is that Gebhardt was the son of a wealthy Dutchman who married his housekeeper and neglected the proper training of his son.

Freddie and the Lily

Of course the Jersey Lily will figure in the most interesting stories about Gebhardt. When Mrs. Langtry came to this country with the stamp of royal approval upon her Gebhardt was in the first flush of his success as a racing man and it was as a devotee of the track that she made his acquaintance. He had a fine stable, such horses as Eole, St. Saviour, Rosarium and others carrying his cerise and gold spots. He used to give track dinners which were very jolly affairs and invitations to them were eagerly sought. The Lily was the guest of honor at many of them. When Mrs. Langtry came to San Francisco Gebhardt accompanied her incognito and their relations here as in New York made a choice tidbit for the gossips. Both bought ranches near Middletown in Lake County and although Gebhardt afterwards disposed of his I think that Mrs. Langtry still retains hers which is the larger and better of the two.

Mrs. Langtry's Kindliness

It was Gebhardt's intention to establish a stock farm on his Lake County ranch and he shipped his stallions and brood mares from Long Branch. The train on which they were to cross the continent was in a disastrous wreck at Port Jervis and there was great loss of life. Nearly the whole of Gebhardt's stable was destroyed, St. Saviour being one of the few to escape. As an instance of Mrs. Langtry's kindliness it is told that she hurried with Gebhardt to the scene of the wreck and worked with heart and soul to ease the pain of the sufferers, bathing and bandaging their injuries and attending them through the night. Among the injured was a pretty young woman who was starting on her honeymoon. Her head was lacerated and the doctors said that her hair would have to be cut off in order that the wound might be properly treated. But Mrs. Langtry would not allow them to do this and herself braided the sufferer's hair in such a way that it would not interfere with the treatment. After that wreck Gebhardt gradually drifted away from the track but returned years later when Gay Boy was one of his big winners and his Raglan won the Spinaway stakes of eleven thousand dollars.

His First Marriage

Gebhardt's first marriage was far from happy and was fraught with sensational episodes. His bride was Miss Lulu Morris of Baltimore, one of the best bred and most beautiful belles of the oriole city. She was a good deal younger than Freddie and of a very frolicsome disposition. One of her pranks was to wade through a public fountain with Harry Lehr. It was said at the time that she was attracted to Gebhardt by the glamor of his liaison with Mrs. Langtry. However that may be their married life was unhappy. Like so many others who have trodden the primrose path Gebhardt married to settle down but his bride had no such intention and as events proved, he did not settle down either. They spent their honeymoon at the bride's solicitation in the Long Branch cottage where Freddie and the Lily had lolled away many a rubescent hour. Soon after the marriage it was whispered that Mrs. Freddie was jealous of her husband's attentions to the daughter-in-law of Philadelphia's street car magnate. Then there was a divorce. Afterwards she married Henry Clews.

A Newport Scandal

On the heels of the divorce came a scandal which convulsed Newport and was reported in the papers without the names of the participants being given, although they speedily became known. The story went that one of the Newport cottagers invaded the privacy of his wife's boudoir in the wee sma' hours and found that she was entertaining a well known Lothario. So he took a shot at Lothario. Next day Freddie Gebhardt was nursing a bullet wound in his shoulder and a millionaire and his young wife departed from Newport with extreme precipitation. Gebhardt's second wife was one of the original Florodora beauties. She was with him at the time of his death. In his later years Gebhardt became sedate and somnolent and lost his interest in dandyism. It used to be said that he never recovered from the shock of the Lily's desertion. It was even reported that his grief caused his mustache to turn white. Of course these stories were exaggerations but they point to his mad infatuation of which there can be no doubt.

The hen returned to her nest only to find it empty.

Dundon's Retort Courteous

Pat Dundon, one of our most successful iron-mongers, has recently extended his operations to Marin County and is just now engaged in establishing a creosoting plant on the bay at South San Rafael. Dundon is pre-eminently a business man with small regard for estheticism and his plant is being constructed on lines of anything but architectural beauty. The ironmonger's lack of artistic appreciation is every day filling the cultured souls of Marin's most distinguished citizens with a deepening irritation and there are in prospect injunction proceedings to prevent Dundon from disfiguring the landscape. In particular Truxtun Beale, Colonel Frank Johnson and Porter Ashe who have beautiful homes in the vicinity of the hated creosote plant are lashing their rage to fury over the defilement of their view. But the indignation concentrates within the grounds of the Marin Golf and Country Club where the horrors of creosote have become the staple of polite conversation. The wire gates of the club open almost directly upon Dundon's plant, so the exclusives of San Rafael have an easy view of their abomination. Dundon has recently been lightering material for his plant to South San Rafael and has been landing it with the aid of a small donkey engine. A few days ago the steward of the club noticed the smoke from the wood fire in the donkey engine and concluded that the creosote plant was in full blast. He determined on a coup. So he indited a note to Dundon in which he declared that the acrid fumes from the creosote works had entered through the gates into the sacred precincts of the club and had nearly asphyxiated several of the workmen. He demanded that the plant be shut down forthwith. To which Dundon laconically replied: "If the smoke enters through the gates I would suggest that you shut them."

Where Are the Oregon Builders?

By the recent Labor Day parade designed for the greater glory of our prosperous unions and their proud and haughty bosses we were reminded of the fact that the metal trades have ceased to be an important factor in the industrial life of this community. In the years agone the metal workers were a prominent feature in Labor Day parades. They were five thousand strong. Who has forgotten the elaborate battleship float of the men from the Union Iron Works who proudly proclaimed themselves the builders of the "Oregon"? What has become of those gallant artisans who took such pride in their achievements? By the ruinous policies of Organized Labor they have been forced to seek elsewhere for work. Today San Francisco can no longer compete with Portland, Seattle or Los Angeles in the metal trades. And yet metal worker do not receive high wages. Compared with wages paid in the building trades and considering the high cost of living metal workers are poorly paid. But this is not the fault of their employers. It is due to artificial conditions established by Organized Labor. Men engaged in the building trades, many of whom are not skilled workmen, who are doing work that requires but a few months' experience, are receiving double the amount of wages provided for in the schedule of the metal trades. This is one of the results of paying no heed to the law of supply and demand and of fixing wages arbitrarily without regard for any of the elements that are inherent in the labor market. We are sorely in need of a readjustment of conditions in our little industrial world. It is essential both to the welfare of wage-earners and employers, and it is of the most vital importance to the whole city. The situation is well understood in every newspaper office in San Francisco, but our cowardly press is engrossed in matters that may be discussed without the slightest danger of impairing circulation, and our foolish merchants have neither the sense nor the courage to administer a little wholesome discipline.

An Oregon Critic

This subject of unionism in San Francisco was recently discussed in the Iron Trade Review by W. H. Corbett, President of the Willamette Iron and Steel Works of Portland. He refers to San Francisco as "The bottle-tight union city of the United States." Speaking of our eight-hour day in the iron trades he says: "No one city of the United States is of sufficient importance in any one industry to dictate its policy to all other cities, and the apparent conception of the mechanics of San Francisco that they can equalize the handicap which they have forced on their employers by bringing the rest of the United States to the eight-hour day is founded on a spirit of intolerant bigotry and domination which is the rock on which modern labor unionism will wreck itself." And he adds: "The United Metal Trades Association of the North Pacific Coast, the Founders' and Employers' Association of Los Angeles, and the Employers' Association of Oregon are firmly entrenched behind the broad American principles of the open shop movement."

Mr. Corbett in all probability isn't aware of the plans and purposes of Colonel Weinstock, the illustrious "mark-em down" merchant of San Francisco who has volunteered to solve all our labor problems by means of legislation. The Colonel is going in strong for voluntary arbitration grounded in the principle of moral suasion. Neither side to a dispute will be bound by the decision of the Weinstock Arbitration Commission, but both sides will be expected to succumb to its moral force. This glorious plan is the fruit of a profound study of labor conditions in Russia, Turkey and the Congo.

The Greatness of Mrs. Atherton

Gertude Atherton, California's most distinguished native daughter, is the predominant theme in the current Books-News Monthly. F. M. Holly has written a biographical sketch of her, Richard Le Gallienne has supplied an appreciation and Herman Scheffauer has written of the places in which she has worked and the life which she has depicted. From Mr. Holly we learn that there is one thing that Mrs. Atherton always demands—"that she shall not be lionized or to be asked innumerable times what she thinks of suffrage, the future of the novel and the question." Richard Le Gallienne pronounces Mrs. Atherton "the greatest woman writer since George Eliot." He adds: "Other women have written with brilliancy and charm, and sometimes with delightfully affected style—borrowed (dare one whisper it?) from certain men writers whose modern euphuism has imposed a hypnotic influence upon their day and generation. But no woman, except Mrs. Atherton, has written with power. Nor, since George Meredith is dead, is there any man writing with an equally spontaneous vitality and large mental grasp of the modern world." Mr. Le Gallienne's enthusiasm waxes as he goes along. He finally says, "Putting aside Mr. Thomas Hardy, who, alas! writes novels no more, Mrs. Atherton is the greatest novelist writing in English today." He predicts that some of her word pictures will some day find their way into anthologies of English prose." Herman Scheffauer says of Mrs. Atherton that in her California scenes is "almost a Dionysian sympathy with the setting—a penetration of the mystery and a revelation of the soul of those native regions known and loved by her so long and so well." Scheffauer tells of the environment in which Mrs. Atherton wrote each of her novels. Coming down to the "Tower of Ivory" he says, "It seems fitting that for the creation of this Luciferian work, which of all her works the author deems most vital and most subtle, she should again have returned to her native State with all her hoard of observation, experience and knowledge of man, history and life. She fled the feverish pother of the new San Francisco, but remained within sight of it, in a tavern on Mount Tamalpais, a peak that dominates the bay and affords one of the grandest prospects in the world. . . . Later, she descended into San Francisco, and, unknown to her friends, buried herself in a modest hotel, close to the ruinous City Hall, whose enormous walls and towers, shattered by the earthquake, were being demolished by dynamite. From the calm or tempests of the mountain summit to the thunder of a city besieged, to streets filled with clouds of dust and lime, and to houses shaken by the blasting—as if the temblor had come again—was but a step that could not interrupt the author's work. Thus in the manner and method of her writing, as in her matter and her style, there is something spacious, large and adventurous, a quality of freedom and of impatient fire that urges her on from restlessness without to restfulness within and back again."

A Millionaire's Yacht For Sale

John D. Spreckels is going East, I hear, to buy a yacht. And if he gets the one he is going after he will have one of the costliest and most sumptuously appointed pleasure boats in America. This yacht was built for a man who was once a multi-millionaire, but is now in need of a little ready money. The yacht is what the press-agent of a steamship company would describe as "a floating palace." It costs nearly a million dollars, and as it carries a crew of about forty men it requires a pretty large income to keep it going. Mr. Spreckels has been told that he can get the yacht for about $100,000, and he is prepared to plunge to that extent. Some years ago Mr. Spreckels was an enthusiastic yachtsman. His yacht, the Lurline, one of the finest and fastest on the bay, participated in many a race to Santa Cruz and carried many a jolly party of good fellows in the days when John D. Spreckels delighted in playing the host and in encouraging his friends to sit up with the stars and pour libations in their honor.

Rudolph Put His Foot Down

The morning newspapers of last Saturday announced on their sporting pages that as a part of the day's Native Son celebration a baseball would be thrown from the top of the Call Building and caught by a player in the street. This is a feat which has been accomplished at the Washington Monument and naturally the baseball fans were eager to witness its repetition, so they gathered in a dense mob around the Call Building. But the time designated for the feat passed by and nothing happened. Naturally the fans are curious to know why. They will be interested to learn that the feat was abandoned for the simple reason that Rudolph Spreckels does not like John D., the proprietor of the Call, and never misses an opportunity, no matter how petty, to show his feeling. When Rudolph read the announcement in the Call he telephoned to Editor Hornick and reminded him that the Call rented only two floors of the building and would he kindly confine his activities to those two floors? Rudolph declared further that he did not propose to have his building turned into a sideshow. In the circumstances Hornick had to call off the ball-throwing stunt.

The Osteopathic System

The convention of the American Osteopathic Association recently held in San Francisco has aroused so much interest in the new science of healing, so many questions have been asked concerning it by the reasoning and thinking public and the desire is so great to know something about the way in which the skilled practitioner is able to secure such seeming marvelous results that "Town Talk" has endeavored to give some light on the subject.

It was in 1873, that, after years of careful research and investigation, the principles upon which the science of osteopathy rests were discovered by Andrew Taylor Still, M. D., at Baldwin, Kansas. He was a physician of the Allopathic school and a surgeon of the Union Army during the civil war.

So far ahead of the time was he that he was considered insane by the people with whom he came in contact, and he was avoided by many of his former friends. For about 18 years in poverty, alone and unaided he struggled on with the "child of his thought," continuing his researches and practicing along the line of his new theories.

About this time (1892) his practice had grown to such proportions that he needed assistance, and being convinced that he had a science that could be taught to others, the "American School of Osteopathy" was chartered at Kirksville, Mo., and a small class matriculated.

From this beginning the science has grown until there are eight active schools of osteopathy in the United States, with nearly 5,000 practitioners who revere the "Old Doctor," as he is familiarly called.

Two years ago, on his 80th birthday, the American Osteopathic Association, numbering nearly 2,000 active members, met at his home town, Kirksville, Mo., to do him honor. He is still actively engaged in the pursuit of his loved study, in possession of fairly good health and keen mentally.

"What standing has the osteopathic practitioner?" is a question frequently asked. In no respect is the favor with which osteopathy has been received by the public better shown than by the recognition given it by the legislators of the various States. In over 40 States, territories and possessions of the United States this school of medicine is legally recognized, and practitioners are now found in many of the foreign countries.

Nearly 20 of the States have independent osteopathic boards, and the rest a composite board consisting of representatives from the homeopathic, allopathic and osteopathic schools of healing usually proportionate to the number of practitioners in the State. California has two osteopathic members on the State Board of Medical Examiners. It naturally goes without saying that the osteopathic students must be as well qualified as the graduates from the other schools when they come up before the same board, and take the same examinations. The osteopathic principles and technique, and materia medica are relegated to the individual colleges, as no one who is not a graduate of a recognized school is permitted to appear before the board.

Why should not an osteopathic student be well prepared when the minimum time now required for actual attendance is three years of nine months each? Already in some of the colleges the time is extended to four years, and this soon will be compulsory in all.

Meaning of the Word Osteopathy

Osteopathy is made up of two Greek words, "ostion" signifying bone and "pathos" which means suffering (to suffer)—from this we get the English equivalent "pathy." Strictly speaking, the word "osteopathy" carries the meaning of "bone suffering" or "bone disease."

The first misconception of the science often arises here. It is an exceedingly difficult matter to find any one word that can fully explain a complete work, or comprehensive science. Take the term "homeopathy," for instance, which literally means "like suffering" or "allopathy" meaning "other suffering." What logical connection would they suggest to one who is not familiar with the theories, drugs and practices which they represent? Just so with osteopathy. It is not alone the treatment of "bone diseases" nor the conception that diseases are so often due to the faulty adjustment of the bones of the body's framework that goes to make up the true conception of this science.

The bones are used as landmarks to locate and define disorders in the body, and they are used as levers in many movements, to secure adjustment of body tissues.

The science of osteopathy includes all the fundamental facts and principles of anatomy, physiology, pathology and hygiene interpreted and applied in a new and practical way to explain and relieve diseases. It recognizes the existing diseased conditions, but differs in its theory as to the cause and methods of treatment.

Osteopathy is a drugless method of healing disease. Its doctrine is that the human body is capable of producing the necessary fluids and forces which are essential for good health. It teaches that the body was perfected to produce its own essentials, and takes this position as the basic ground of its doctrine.

From the "Old Doctor's" idea it grew and grew until in a brief term of years it has developed into a science which numbers its practitioners by the thousands, and followers by the hundreds of thousands.

Osteopathic Theories

The osteopathic practitioners believe that mechanical causes generally are primary, and the chemical changes are secondary conditions in causing disease; that prenatally the body is made up of cells, the multiplication of which goes on and on until every part of the system has been constructed out of cells that were chemically formed under the guidance of natural laws. Another natural law assigns them to their proper place in the body structure, thus giving each cell a definite place and duty to perform. The normal activities of the body will move along in a perfect manner so long as no part is disturbed by a neighboring cell, has its normal blood and nerve supply and the waste matter is properly eliminated. A disturbed physical relation with its cell neighbors produces a modification of its activities by increasing or diminishing them. If too long continued it may alter the chemical construction of the cell, due to faulty nutrition produced by physical disturbances of either or both the blood stream or nerve force sent to the distressed area of the body. Give nature the opportunity and she will herself make the chemical adjustment.

The vital action of all cell life results from two factors,—the protoplasmic structure with its inherent life force on one hand, and environment on the other. With this inherent force we have nothing to do; we cannot even comprehend it, much less create it, but we may aid or hinder its manifestations. Therapy has only to do with cell environments. Its field of operation is that of an assistant to nature.

Osteopathy does this by removing the causes of discord in the system, and aiding Nature in the restoration of the normal blood and nerve supply of the diseased parts.

Adjustment

Adjustment is a very good synonym for osteopathy. It really is the key note to the practice. When maladjustments causing disease in the body are found the practitioner endeavors to correct them and restore harmony in the system. Contractions and congestions are removed. Obstructions causing impairment or blockade to the free and natural flow of blood, lymph and nervous energy are lifted. Nature does the real curing. She always is ready to meet us more than half way. Osteopathy only assists her to go on with her normal work.

Not a Cure-All

Do not be misled to think that everything can be cured. There are limitations even to what nature and science can do. An incontrovertible law of the universe cannot be overcome. Everything is not curable, but this system does treat practically everything, and cures everything curable, and does cure many chronic cases that have been considered hopeless. These results are not secured instantly, however. In fact, most chronic cases yield only slowly to treatment. It is the rare and rather exceptional cases when a few treatments effect a cure in such instances.

Wherein Osteopathy is Original

It is not the claim of the "Old Doctor" or his followers that the basic facts and principles upon which this new system rests are essentially new discoveries, but only that their application is new.

All schools accept isolated facts and principles of anatomy, physiology and pathology out of which this new science of osteopathy has been constructed, but no other medical teacher before Dr. A. T. Still ever brought these facts into a system which is able to not only relieve much sickness and deformity without the aid of drug medication and the knife, but in so many instances to effect permanent cures.

Cause and Effect

The osteopathic practitioner does not pay much attention to symptoms, save as an aid in determining the cause of the disorder, as he believes that by the removal of the cause the symptoms or effects will take care of themselves. For instance, at the sea level the usual rate of respiration for an adult is about sixteen per minute. Remove the individual to the altitude of Pike's Peak and the respiration will be increased to about thirty per minute, due to the fact that the atmospheric pressure in the latter place is only a little more than one-half of what it is at the sea level. The body needs approximately the same amount of oxygen, and as only a little more than one-half as much is taken in at each breath at the higher altitude, respiration is automatically quickened to supply the needs of the body. This increased rate of breathing is natural for the changed environments of the individual, and any attempt to reduce the higher respiratory rate to that of the sea level by chemical means, without a corresponding change of environments, would be considered wholly irrational.

A person sitting for some time with one limb crossed over the knee of the other frequently finds that when he tries to remove the limb from the unnatural position he has lost voluntary control of this member, due to physical interference caused by pressure on the nerves and blood vessels to the foot and limb. Which would be considered the more rational treatment, to remove the cause which in this instance could be done by merely uncrossing the legs, or to treat the foot and limb with chemical stimuli, allowing the same position to be maintained?

These two instances show the futility of trying to correct by chemical means symptoms which are the natural result of conditions due to environment and structure.

The same reasoning applies to the chemical functioning of the internal organs, which, like the rest of the body, are composed of cells. Just so long as the cell relationship is maintained there is no interference with the normal mechanism.

One thing take notice about. Osteopathy does not injure a healthy part in treating any case of disease. The stomach is strengthened in treating for lung troubles, rheumatism, sciatica, etc., instead of being weakened by the administration of opiates or salicylates. The heart or circulation is not injured in treating headache or any form of nervous disease, as by the taking of a coal tar preparation or any kind of a depressant. The well parts are kept well, and the diseased parts are put in a condition to recover, if recovery is possible.

Most Diseases are of Spinal Origin

This is a characteristic generalization of osteopathy in a nut shell. This diagnosis is new,

The Wonderful Crocker Ball

The debut of Miss Ethel Crocker was made successfully last week at a ball that will long be remembered for its brilliance. It was notable too for the atmosphere of simple cordial hospitality that prevailed in all the splendor of its setting. No more beautiful entertainment has been given in California, not excepting the much discussed orchid party of Miss Vera De Sabla last year. Miss Ethel greeted the friends of her father and mother with unaffected grace, standing with them in a small reception room across the broad entrance hall of New Place. She held a shower bouquet of lilies of the valley on one arm and was a charming picture of unspoiled girlhood, later dancing with a zest that proved she was having the time of her life. For that matter every one had a good time from the oldest matron to the youngest maid. Proof of this, the by changing colored lights, and there were marble seats and statuary to add to the Roman effect. Any sort of supper served in this fairyland would have been nectar and ambrosia. As it was, no illusion was necessary. Just before supper dancing ceased while guests repaired to the garden to watch a performance of fire works on the hill opposite, the lawns making a natural amphitheater for the show. People who went down in the private train were obliged to leave at 1:30 but half the guests were housed at Burlingame and San Mateo and these danced till morning.

Teddy Jr. Was Not There

There have been several published lists of those present at the ball, but these lists are particularly interesting for their omissions. Conspicuously absent were Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt Jr. who did not receive cards to the festivity. This fact has caused a great deal of discussion as it definitely marks the continuance of a social division which many thought would be ignored. The dividing line had never before been so markedly drawn since the arrival of the young Roosevelts in San Francisco. Among the others who were absent from the ball were the Henry Crockers, the George Sperrys and the Jolliffe sisters who are among Jennie Crocker's intimates. Henry Crocker is the cousin of Will Crocker while George Sperry is the brother of Mrs. Will Crocker.

They Asked, "Who Is She?"

There was an unexpected entry in the list of debutantes at the Crocker ball and before the evening was half over every one had noted her beauty and asked every one else who she was. Her tall slender grace and wonderful Titian gold hair were conspicuous in a ball-room full of pretty girls. The demure debutante who so suddenly burst from her chrysalis of obscurity proved to be Miss Jane Dudley of Menlo. She is the daughter of Mrs. A. Palmer Dudley who was one of the Adams girls of "Cassandra Hills," another of whom is Mrs. Ansel Easton, so Miss Dudley is remotely a connection of Miss Jennie Crocker whose mother was Ansel Easton's sister. Her own sister is Mrs. Oliver Kehrlein, the former Frances Coon, Mrs. Dudley having married Fred Coon, brother of Mrs. W. F. McNutt Jr., her first husband. It is all rather complicated but guests at the Crocker ball patiently worked it out inspired by the girlish loveliness of the new debutante.

A Radiant Beauty

Another of the younger crowd who was much admired was Miss Dora Winn whose resemblance to her mother was noted by the older matrons. She has the same large expressive eyes that added much to Dora Boardman's beauty and a natural charm that also characterized the late Mrs. Winn whose death when Miss Dora was only a few weeks old was so keenly mourned. Miss Winn wore white at the Crocker ball as did all of the other debutantes, but her gown was spangled lightly with silver that seemed to reflect the radiance of her personality.

The Three Gregg Beauties

"The three Gregg beauties," as many referred to Mrs. Wellington Gregg and her two girls, Enid and Ethel, were conceded to be the handsomest trio at the ball and not even the little pink-and-white buds with their flower-like prettiness and girlish freshness were more sought after. Absolutely original and distinctive were the Greggs, with a simple unostentatious style that few would care to hazard. One thing that made this charming matron and her two daughters so attractive in that assembly of the beauties of society was the classical severity of their coiffures. Instead of the artificial curls, puffs, braids, Janes, rats and so on by which so many pretty women disfigure the shape of their heads, Mrs. Gregg and her two daughters followed the style of the Greek statues. It takes genuine beauty of hair to do this—it must be ample, it must be soft and silky and it must be one's own—and it takes diligent hours of brushing to attain that bewitching simplicity.

She's of an Interesting Family bridge tables were deserted. No one was sufficiently bored to seek the diversion of cards although tables had been arranged in two of the smaller drawing-rooms for guests who cared to play. Not a single pack of cards was cut. A long drawing-room and the dining-room with hard-wood floors were arranged for dancing and in a small apartment between them the music was stationed. From this French windows opened into the pavilion, the fairy beauty of which drew wondering admiration. It was built over a terrace on the lawn and arranged to represent a Roman garden. White pillars were twined with garlands of red and purple asters and oak leaves. The walls were screened with a forest of greens and across the terraced side where the lawn was left uncovered dwarf orange trees and hydrangea bushes bloomed in profusion. Among them a fountain played, the spray lit were daughters of Judge Hall McAllister whose home in South Park was a rendezvous for the smart set of early days. He was a brother of New York's famous Ward McAllister so Miss Wise is a grand-niece of that social arbiter. Her mother's second husband was Dr. Wagner, the oculist. Mrs. Wagner's death occurred when her daughter was very young. Miss Wise was educated abroad and has made her home with the Newlands family for a number of years.

What Joe Said to Emile

The recent imbroglio which has convulsed the chancelleries of society from Turin to Del Monte, from the foot of the Alps to the slope of the Coast Range, has revived many stories bearing on the infatuation of Joe Eastland for Vesta Shortridge Bruguere. One of them concerns a conversation which took place between Joe Eastland and Emile Bruguere when the divorce which afterwards took place was still an uncertainty. Bruguere and Eastland met one day. "Emile," said Joe, "you owe it to Vesta and you owe it to me to say what you are going to do." But with a noncommittal smile Emile went on his way swinging the inevitable cane.

At the Illington Premiere

Society did not respond last Monday night to the emotional appeal of Margaret Illington's stressful experience. Although there was a long line of limousines and taxis in McAllister street the members of the smart set who usually grace an important first night were conspicuous by their absence. The boxes were occupied by parties who do not receive recognition in the charmed circles. From which it might be inferred that Miss Illington's reappearance was not regarded by society as an important social event and that Mrs. Edward J. Bowes is not to receive the hospitality which is so enthusiastically accorded to Mrs. Pat Campbell, Miss Ethel Barrymore and Miss Billie Burke whenever they visit this city. This is not surprising. Miss Illington would be more likely to possess social importance as the wife of Daniel Frohman than as the wife of Ed Bowes who never aspired to admission within the exclusive corral. And of course society feels itself bound to frown upon that notorious sock-darning interview. Ed Bowes by the way was very much in evidence at the Savoy on Monday night. He stood in the lobby and carefully greeted all his old friends and acquaintances. He was garbed in accordance with the very latest say-so of masculine fashion and sported a silk tile which drew more than cursory attention.

The Heydenfeldt Family

It is inevitable, I suppose, that the suit which the widow of Judge Heydenfeldt is about to bring for the recovery of property only accidentally discovered as belonging to her husband's estate will cause a rattling of the bones of the ugly skelton in the Heydenfeldt closet. Judge Heydenfeldt was an honored member of the community but after his death there burst upon his friends the revelation of a double life not unlike that which George D. Collins led for so many years. Two women lived with him in wifely relations and bore him children at the same time. There were still other complications in his domestic relations, the whole forming an amazing tangle stranger than fiction. The judge was an uncle of Mrs. William J. Dutton whose maiden name was Mary Heydenfeldt. Daisy, her sister, married William B. Hellings, a well known mining man from whom she was afterwards separated. Susie Heydenfeldt married one of the Berryman's after whom the North Berkeley station is named. The judge's widow Mrs. Elizabeth Heydenfeldt is half-sister to the late Mrs. Hepburn who was well known in days gone by. The Osmonts who are concerned in the forthcoming suit belong to a well known family of Tennessee. T. M. Osmont came here many years ago and died just before the fire leaving a widow and two children, Ardelia, now Mrs. Clarence Sperry and Vance who married the youngest daughter of the late Marcus Hall. Mrs. Osmont who lives in Berkeley is a cultured and traveled woman of the South.

The opening of the recital season of the California Conservatory of Music was marked by a Kruger-Walcker recital at the Columbia Theater on Sunday, September 11. The proceeds will be devoted to the Conservatory's free scholarship fund. Mr. Kruger presided at the piano while Mr. Walcker's fine basso was heard in some splendid selections. Gladys Downs Creighton was the accompanist.

The Automobile Authoress

Mrs. C. N. Williamson the novelist who has been visiting the Tom Williams country place on McCloud River is as vivacious and fascinating a literary lion as Elinor Glyn. She is witty and clever but not so disconcertingly frank in her comments as the sulphuric Mrs. Glyn. Mrs. Williamson was formerly the wife of Colonel William Hamilton, U. S. A., but army life didn't appeal to her. The women bored her and a deadly round of hops and card parties finally drove her to New York where she appeared for a season on the stage under Daniel Frohman's management. When the courts freed her from Colonel Hamilton she married her present husband and gave up acting to collaborate with him in writing books. Her son Lieutenant Charles Hamilton of the army married Miss Ethel Low, daughter of Judge Low who now holds a judicial position in Manila, so she is mother-in-law to a former San Francisco belle. Also she is a grandmother which would never be guessed from her refreshing personality and youthful appearance.

Mrs. Delmas to Live in New York

Mrs. D. M. Delmas, I am told, is soon to leave California and take up her residence permanently in New York. When Mr. Delmas was in town some weeks ago it was reported that he had returned to resume practice in San Francisco. The truth is that he came hither to attend to some important business, but not to stay. He is coming back again in a few weeks, and he will then be joined by his wife who will accompany him to New York.

The Clarendon of Seabreeze

About November 1 the new Hotel Clarendon, Seabreeze, Fla., will be completed. The original Clarendon was burned on February 14 of last year and work on the new structure began on the same day just a year later. The new Clarendon is built of reinforced concrete and is claimed to be the only absolutely fire proof hotel in the world devoted solely to winter tourists. It is seven stories high and contains 368 guest and 300 bath rooms. The architecture is of the Spanish type with mission tile roofing. Ample provisions are, of course, provided for indoor and outdoor amusement. Guides and experienced hunters with deer hounds, bear and bird dogs will be furnished. For automobilists there is a garage with accommodations for 100 machines and fully equipped machine shops. In the garage will be a number of rooms with baths for the exclusive use of chauffeurs. The Clarendon will be operated by the Clarendon Hotel Company of which E. L. Potter, proprietor of the Hotel Van Nuys, Los Angeles, is president. Wm. S. Kenney will be manager. C. H. Knappe, the former manager of the Clarendon, has charge of Mr. Potter's interests in Los Angeles and is manager of the Hotel Van Nuys. One of the interesting features of the Clarendon is the housing of the employees. There are two buildings containing 150 rooms for their exclusive use. Each building has an entertainment room, numerous baths and lavatories and is equipped throughout in a manner that is unusual in buildings for employees.

In the Social Spotlight

Mr. and Mrs. Leon S. Greenbaum have just returned from an outing in Alaska. While away they made a trip to Lake Louise in Canada, and climbed Mount Hood. They are domiciled at the St. Francis for the winter.

Dr. Stanton Coit who is to visit the United States, will cross the continent making no stops en route, and upon arriving in San Francisco will give his first series of lectures. He will then visit as many of the eastern states as possible and at the end of December will return to London. While in San Francisco he is to speak upon

The Influence of Husbands on Stars

A Purely Speculative Disquisition with an Illustration from the Career of Margaret Illington Who Has Been Husbanded by Daniel Frohman and Edward J. Bowes and is Now Playing "Until Eternity" at the Savoy

By Edward F. O'Day

Far be it from me to advance the revolutionary dogma that a husband is a necessary adjunct of feminine stardom. In most cases it would seem to hold true that a husband is rather the result than the condition of an actress' success. It is not the mute inglorious spear-carrier but the pampered, petted and desired diva who shuts the gates of happiness on a Chanler. In fact the husband is so much an afterthought with the artiste that it is not always necessary for her to think of him at all. Sometimes she marries only to ignore her husband and at other times she ignores the marriage ceremony—witness Bernhardt who has achieved immortality and grandparentage without the assistance of that useful and popular institution. But when an actress sees fit to divide her affection between the drama and a husband it is obviously impertinent to pry into her domestic affairs. It is none of my business, in other words, whether or not Mrs. Daniel Frohman was happy with Mr. Daniel Frohman. It is equally none of my business whether or not Mrs. Edward J. Bowes is happy with Mr. Edward J. Bowes. I have no doubt that they are ideally so. But there is another angle of this problem, an angle which juts into the field of legitimate criticism and which I have every right to measure. I cannot ignore the interesting fact that Margaret Illington, the actress, has had two managers during her starring career and that both managers have been her husbands. Is it not permissible therefore to inquire into the influence which these husbands exerted on Margaret Illington in their managerial capacity? Certainly so, if the inquiry prove a valuable contribution to the philosophy of the stage. When Margaret Illington was under the management of Daniel Frohman she starred in "The Thief." I had not the pleasure of seeing her in the part. I did see Irene Vanburgh play it in London and Effie Shannon in San Francisco Competent authorities who have seen all three assure me that Margaret Illington played it not as well as Irene Vanburgh but better than Effie Shannon. Dramatic critics have told me that she played it with wonderful emotional effect and though dramatic critics are frequently untrustworthy there is no reason to doubt the statement. Now I have seen Margaret Illington in "Until Eternity" and unfortunately she is starring in "Until Eternity" under the management of Edward J. Bowes. I say "unfortunately" because the fact places Bowes in unfortunate contrast with Frohman, particularly as Bowes' managerial appearance has been emphasized. Frohman is a manager of experience; he has matured in the difficult business. So he knew how to choose a play for Margaret Illington. The Bernstein drama is one of the most effective emotional pieces that have been contributed to the stage for a long time. As Miss Illington's forte is emotional acting "The Thief" undoubtedly gave her an opportunity to exercise her talents to the best advantage. Besides that she had the benefit of the personal supervision of a very cultured theatrical man whose instruction must have aided her interpretative efforts wonderfully. Daniel Frohman had managed many actresses before he starred Miss Illington and he knew how to develop all her powers. The result was the great success which she had in "The Thief." On the other hand Edward J. Bowes is a newcomer in the theatrical world. He is in it but not of it. He proved that conclusively when he accepted "Until Eternity" for Miss Illington's reappearance. That was a singular infelicity of selection. "Until Eternity" is so crowded with sins against the drama that the author's inclusiveness might almost be construed as a piece of wrong-headed ingenuity, admirable for its thoroughness. If he has overlooked a single opportunity to violate the canons of playwriting I am doing him a grave injustice, for the only palliation of his offending is its catholicity. To prove that he hasn't a pet rule he has broken them all. As for his dialogue I overheard a firstnighter remark that he had evidently rifled Gellett Burgess' Essay on Bromides. When Bowes accepted "Until Eternity" he made Margaret Illington's reappearance on the stage an obstacle race in which it would be impossible to win. She has bravely tried to surmount the difficulties of her play but they are insuperable. I am inclined to think that she would have done better under the management of a Daniel Frohman, for I never heard her criticized for crudity during her Frohman stardom and there are undoubted crudities in her present performance. If Mr. Bowes supervises Miss Illington's rehearsals he should tell her that emotional acting is not necessarily a question of a tumultuously heaving bosom, of ever-moving shoulders and of facial distortions. Some of Miss Illington's mannerisms suggested acute neurasthenia rather than emotion. Judging therefore from Margaret Illington's experience it may be concluded that husbands who are also managers may exercise either a good or a bad influence on feminine stars. They exercise a good influence when they are good managers and a bad influence when they are bad managers; and in justice to Mr. Bowes it needs be said that a bad manager is usually an inexperienced one. The conclusion is hardly a triumph of dialectics or critical acumen. It does not add as much to the philosophy of the stage as I thought it would. Let us file it among the bromides, like the lines of "Until Eternity." Let us also tread a little on private ground by remarking that as it was unfortunate for Daniel Frohman to fail as a husband while succeeding as a manager, it must be a great consolation for Edward J. Bowes to realize that while failing as a manager he has been successful in the more important relation.

Will Greenbaum's Coming Season

Manager Will L. Greenbaum, to whom artistic San Francisco is accustomed to look for the greater number of its concert and other special musical attractions, announces that he has almost completed his arrangements for the coming musical season and that it promises to be the most brilliant in the history of music in this community. The combination of the Metropolitan and Manhattan opera companies has made possible the engagement of some great stars who have never before visited the West and the array of vocalists promised is simply stupendous. Negotiations with other artists are still pending but the list of attractions positively secured up to the present time includes the following: For the opening attraction on Sunday afternoon, October 16, Signor Antonio Scotti, the favorite baritone of the Metropolitan who was with us at the time of the great disaster. At the recent season of the Metropolitan company in Paris Scotti was one of the great successes, his rendition of the roles of Scarpia and Falstaff being a revelation to the Parisians. Mme. Bernice de Pasquali, the lyric soprano who succeeded Mme. Sembrich at the Metropolitan and who has been reengaged there this season, especially for Mozart roles, will be associated with Scotti in these concerts. Following Scotti Mme. Johanna Gadski, one of San Francisco's favorites and now the leading Wagnerian and dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan, will give a series of recitals. Mme. Liza Lehman, the English composer who wrote "The Vicar of Wakefield" for David Bispham and whose vocal quartettes including "The Persian Garden" have made her world famous, will appear with a quartette of singers of her own selection, the composer herself presiding at the piano. In the latter part of November, by arrangement with the Metropolitan Opera House of New York and the Imperial Opera of St. Petersburg and by guaranteeing a great sum of money for the engagement, Mr. Greenbaum will be able to present the Imperial Russian Ballet of thirty dancers headed by Mlle. Anna Pavlova and M. Michael Mordkin. These dancers were the sensational success of Gatti-Cazazza's great season last year and will again appear for six weeks at the Metropolitan following their tour of the West. A complete scenic investiture and a symphony orchestra of forty-five of the best players from the Metropolitan will accompany the organization on tour. Nearly one hundred people will travel with the company. The final offering for 1910 will be Signor Emilio de Gogorza, the ever welcome Spanish baritone. Shortly after the holidays Mme. Gerville-Reache, the great contralto of the Hammerstein forces whose success in "Electra," "Samson and Delilah" and "La Navarraise" was one of the sensations of that impresario's season last year, will appear for the first time in the West. Jaroslav Kocian, the Bohemian violin virtuoso who under the Bouvier-Greenbaum management played with great success at the Alhambra nine years ago, will make his reappearance in January and in February we are promised some special programs by Mlle. Emma Calve whose place on the operatic stage has never been filled. Calve is at present breaking all records in Australia and her voice is said to be as beautiful as ever. The only pianist thus far engaged is Josef Hoffman who is always sure of a warm welcome here. Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, will appear in March, as will also Signor Alessandro Bonci, the world's greatest lyric tenor who is one of the few Italian singers able to give a complete recital and offer the great "lieder" of all countries. For the final attraction of his season Greenbaum has secured the Russian Symphony Orchestra of fifty-five players under the direction of Mr. Modest Altschuler. A portion of this orchestra under Altschuler appeared here two years ago with the Ben Greet Players and made a profound impression. Altschuler won signal success at the memorable concert given by Mischa Elman with the same orchestra. A splendid quartette of vocalists will accompany the organization. Mr. Greenbaum promises further announcements in the near future. The St. Francis Musical Art Society will again give a series of artistic programs and Greenbaum has signed the contract to furnish the talent. It will be the most ambitious series of private concerts ever attempted in this city.

Frances Starr in "The Easiest Way"

After an unusually prolonged and successful season at the Belasco Theater in New York, extending to nearly three hundred performances, Frances Starr will be seen at the Columbia Theater for two weeks commencing Monday night, September 19, with the usual Wednesday and Saturday matinees in "The Easiest Way," Eugene Walter's great play. She will have for her two-weeks engagement the support of the New York cast and the scenic equipment will be identical with that provided by David Belasco. Miss Starr's company includes Joseph Kilgour, Edward H. Robins, John V. Brown, Louise Randolph and Violet Rand.

A Lambs Success at the Orpheum

Dinkelspiel's Christmas, a dramatic version of one of George Hobart's famous stories arranged by the author himself, will be the headline feature of next week's Orpheum bill. It was originally produced at a Lambs' Club Gambol in New York where it proved a tremendous success. Harry Linton and Anita Laurence who also come next week are great favorites in this city. Linton is a singing comedian and Miss Laurence a vivacious soubrette. They present "The Piano Store." Waterbury Brothers and Tenny, the popular musical trio, have some fine offerings. Lane and O'Donnell, "The Lunatic Tumblers," will present their "Looping the Bumps." Next week will be the last of the amusing skit "High Life in Jail," Covington and Wilbur, The Four Rianos and Rameses, the Egyptian Wonder Worker in his Temple of Mystery.

"The Wolf" at the Alcazar

Eugene Walter, author of "Paid in Full" and "The Easiest Way" is the author of "The Wolf" which will be the Alcazar's offering during the coming week. This will be San Francisco's first opportunity to witness it as a popular-price production. Grace Barbour will be seen as Hilda, a role enacted by Ida Conquest whose acting methods the Alcazar actress possesses in marked degree. Thurston Hall, Howard Hickman, Burt Wesner and Thomas Chatterton are cast for fine parts. Each of the three acts calls for a realistic setting and the Alcazar's mechanical forces will meet all the requirements.

Another Week of Margaret Illington

The Saturday afternoon and evening performances of "Until Eternity" will mark the end of the first week of Margaret Illington's engagement at the Savoy Theater, and on Monday night she will begin her farewell eight performances. The customary "pop" matinee will be given on Thursday and the final performances of "Until Eternity" will take place Saturday. Sunday evening, September 25, Walker Whiteside, a young actor of great fame who has never appeared in San Francisco, will begin a week's engagement in "The Melting Pot" by Israel Zangwill.

Bevani Grand Opera at the Garrick

The Bevani Grand Opera Company is scoring a brilliant success at the Garrick Theater. For the third week of its engagement which begins next Monday night the repertoire will be as follows: Monday and Saturday nights, "Lucia" with Vicarino, Sacchetti and Alberti; Tuesday night and Saturday matinee, "Cavalleria Rusticana," with Frery, Giuliani and De Dreux, and "I Pagliacci," with Francini, Battain and Campana; Wednesday and Friday nights, by special request, a final performance of "Love Tales of Hoffman," with Vicarino, De Dreux, Sacchetti and Alberti; Thursday night, "Faust," with Frery, Jarman, Battain, Campana and Bevani; Sunday matinee, "Martha," with Francini, Battain and Campana; Sunday night, "Il Trovatore."

"Great Divide" at Ye Liberty

The Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, announce "The Great Divide" for the week commencing next Monday evening. This play, one of the most conspicuous of recent dramatic successes, was made familiar to theatergoers by Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin. It is the work of a poet, William Vaughn Moody. Ye Liberty management are preparing elaborate stage settings and the cast, headed by Sydney Ayres and Muriel Hope, will be capable of doing it full justice.

An Innovation at Idora

When Channing Ellery brought his Royal Italian Band to Idora Park the music loving patrons of that resort discovered that it was something quite different from the ordinary band. They found that Ellery's players made up a truly artistic organization. During the coming week all the night concerts save that of Sunday will be given inside, and there will also be indoor matinees on Tuesday and Thursday. Many special features will be offered and an innovation will be the introducing of pretty scenic effects with some of the big descriptive numbers.

THE PEACEMAKER

When unforeseen circumstances prevent you from keeping "that engagement" let a box of Geo. Haas & Sons' candies smooth away your difficulties. Four stores from which you may send it: Phelan Building, Fillmore at Ellis; Van Ness at Sutter and 28 Market St., near Ferry.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There is very little to say of the Wall Street situation for the recent week as the volume of business has been at a minimum and the changes in prices exceedingly small. While there has been some evidence of good buying under cover, it has not been aggressive, it being evident that bankers were unwilling to have any speculation at present. The advanced condition of all crops shown by the Government report is most reassuring for the business outlook for the fall and winter months; hence we look very favorably toward the security market with the passing of the critical period in money here.

Wheat—Net declines of from 3 to 3 7-8 cents in wheat prices in Chicago tell only part of the story of last week. Bull campaigners who were aggressive to a degree up to ten days ago, have come to recognize the hopelessness of the situation and many of them are now working for profits on the selling side. The unpleasant fact remains that there is a wheat surplus to sell and that the foreign buyer is apparently independent. This in turn makes the domestic buyer slow to take hold and meanwhile the producer is marketing his surplus steadily, with the result that supplies are piling up at the centers of accumulation and carrying charges are widening out very perceptibly. This burden is too great, with the present volume of speculative business, to give the intending investor much encouragement. The world's available supply on September first as per the latest and most complete compilation, shows a total of over 65,000,000 bushels larger than at this time last year, and of this increase nearly 35,000,000 bushels are from America. Russia and the Danubian countries continue to ship enormously. Australia came forward with a very large total last week and Argentine is beginning to clean out the surplus held over from the last crop. In view of the fact that Argentine is due for a good season following two poor ones, the big surplus in the trade channels of the world is just now important.

Corn—Considerable anxiety regarding the safety of the corn crop was felt during the latter part of last week and much of the crop had a pretty narrow escape from frost. Another week would put a large part of the crop out of danger of serious damage and three weeks more would probably bring it all to safety. Frost losses are almost invariably more in quality than in quantity. Meanwhile the brightening prospect for the new crop is causing much marketing of the old. As in wheat it appears that the first arrivals will begin to be surplus producers, so firmly is the hand to mouth policy established on the part of the buyer.

Cotton—The cotton market developed a sagging tendency from the start of the week due to reports of general rains throughout Texas. These rains will be of great benefit to the plant throughout the northern half of Texas and especially in West Texas where the rains are badly needed. In south and southwest Texas the rains were not heavy enough to do much damage to open cotton and they will be of material benefit to late cotton and to the making of a fall crop. Speculation in cotton during the past week has been light. The old bull crowd who were so successful in the manipulation of last year's crop, while openly talking higher prices, were letting the market take care of itself. The bear crowd is timid about getting short around the 13 cent level and is awaiting further crop developments. Receipts continue quite liberal and are expected to be larger as the crop progresses. The mill man is not over anxious at these prices. Liverpool is a buyer in a small way. With the elimination of drouth talk the market from now on will be a traders' market and its course will be governed by receipts and shipments. Outside trade is extremely light.

Copper—The copper producers' statement of last week showed a reduction of 1,700,000 pounds in the net stock of copper in the face of a 9,000,000 pound increase in production. This should have a stimulating effect upon the copper metal market which later should be reflected in the copper share market. The refinery production of 127,000,000 pounds for the month of August practically represents the output of the mines for June when there was very little, if any, curtailment in output. Therefore the August statement should show the largest month's production for many months to come.

A Greek Poet's Suicide

A Greek poet whom Mme. Leblanc-Maeterlinck compared to Hermes for his personal beauty has committed suicide in Athens under the most romantic circumstances.

Pericles Ianopoulos, despite his success and popularity as a poet, gave way to melancholia. At a banquet to which he had summoned all his friends he showed them a trunkful of manuscripts that were to be destroyed.

"Tomorrow I am going on a journey," he said, as they left him. The next morning each of them received by post an exquisite statuette of a horse.

At the same time Ianopoulos had ridden out of the city to Mount Aegaleos. On the Throne of Xerxes he gathered some wild flowers, out of which he made a crown and set it on his brow. Then he mounted his horse, and with revolver in his hand rode down toward the sea.

A violent storm had broken over the country. Ianopoulos, driving his spurs into the horse's flanks, urged the maddened beast into the foaming waters of the bay and shot himself through the heart.

In a letter written to a relative the poet said: "I am giving my dead body to the sea to cleanse. If the sea gives me up, cast me back again."

"You refuse me, then?" said the man on the beach.

"I certainly do," replied the summer girl.

"But I have wealth and position."

"I don't care what you've got, I couldn't possibly marry you."

"And why not, pray?"

"Because you are the thirteenth man who has proposed to me this summer!"

"Elfrida looked up in amazement, while the princess could hardly conceal her amusement."

"What do you mean by the 'old families'?" she asked.

"Why everybody at home knows that my mother was the daughter of J. T. F. Parker-Smith, and everybody knows, too, that the Smiths of New Haven are descended from Governor N. W. Smith, while the Parkers came over in the Mayflower."

Elfrida and Miss Marion hastily stopped to find a skein of silk, but the princess had more control, and asked innocently: "Don't think me impertinent, but may I ask what families your father and husband are descended from?"

"Well, they do not, of course, belong to such old families. But anyone can tell you that we belong to the very best society in Cincinnati. One of the new families offered my sister-in-law, whose husband had just failed, a thousand dollars for an invitation to one of our balls."

Before eleven Bella had come down to the terrace, scattered with garden chairs whose red cushions had been embroidered by Elfrida. She was stretched out on a sofa which had been brought out for her, making a liberal display of openwork silk stockings and pretty little patent-leather shoes.

"Now you must tell me all about yourself and what you do," she was saying to Elfrida.

"Oh, there is so little to tell. We live so quietly!" said Elfrida, who was clad in a clean wash dress and was embroidering a tray-cover for her aunt's birthday.

"Don't you know any people about here, then?"

"Why, we invited the whole neighborhood yesterday."

"Oh, your Neustadter namesakes with whom you have been on bad terms for the last ten years; and the Brinkers, whom you think very common; and the Barnows, who bore you—"

"Yes, that is true, but then we always have some of our relatives staying with us."

"And you travel very little?" asked Bella with keen interest.

"Hardly ever, except to go and see our relatives in Silesia. It isn't everybody who can take such long journeys."

"But what do you do at Riedenheim?"

"Oh, sometimes we drive over in the hunting-wagon to Hohenberg to our forester's and drink coffee. The forest is charmingly situated with a view down the valley. And sometimes we drive over to the other estate and drink coffee with the inspector and pick old fashioned flowers—larkspurs and columbine—and look for fresh eggs in the stable. And then sometimes we go to the Hohenzollern restaurant and drive home by moonlight. And then we have our work."

"What kind of work?"

"Why, Christmas work. We give presents to ninety school children and fifty-five grown-up people, besides all our relatives."

"Oh, I am sure you are very charitable! I know that—Oh, if I only had the time! Some cousins of mine do all sorts of things. They teach wood-carving to young men and boys; they have singing classes for factory girls; they teach hygiene in the houses of the poor; they manage libraries, and all that sort of thing. I suppose you do it, too?"

"Oh, no, it is not the custom here," said Elfrida, quite overwhelmed. "We tried to get up a Sunday service for the children, but the superintendent was quite opposed to it. I should like to visit the sick, but mamma is afraid to have me do it. I sew a good deal for the poor and burn mottoes on wood for the Sdelweiss Bazaar."

"But Eberhard says that your brothers have each six thousand marks a year," she continued, to Elfrida.

"Of course. The Breslau Cuirassiers is a very luxurious regiment, and it is wonderful that they can keep out of debt."

"Oh, I can easily understand now why European girls marry as young as possible."

"It seems the most natural and happy way," said Elfrida, bending over her work.

"We think so, too, but we are in no hurry. I am twenty-seven."

Elfrida, in whose eyes one is an old maid at twenty-five, looked at her in amazement, while Bella continued:

"And I've had all sorts of adventures already; a spring in Paris, where the Russian ambassador went everywhere with us; a winter in Cairo, where I rode with the English officers. Oh, I can't tell you what a heavenly time I've had—and mean to have again!"

Eberhard came up and played with Bella's waving brown hair. She remained in the same unconventional attitude, her ankles in full view. Said Aunt Betty to Miss Marion, as they passed along the terrace: "Rather, a la Lena Borrason, don't you think?"

"No," retorted Miss Marion, energetically. "With all their free and easy ways Americans never go too far."

Elfrida joined her aunt, and the lovers were left alone on the terrace.

"You are the sweetest creature on earth!" exclaimed Eberhard passionately, with a kiss.

"Dear Eberhard, you cannot think how I love you!"

"It is such a relief to me that you like our old Riedenheim."

"I think it is delightful, and I could be happy here at least two or three months in the year—with frequent trips to Berlin and Dresden and Hamburg."

"Why, my dear child, we can't do that. After the next maneuvers, as soon as I get my promotion, I shall resign, and then we shall live here the year round, and make ourselves as comfortable as possible."

"But of course we shall spend our winters in Berlin? I am crazy to go to court! I have already planned a design for my dress—pink velvet with the Hilberg crest in the corners in raised silver embroidery, and a perfect dream of a diamond tiara!"

"Yes, that certainly would be becoming to you, and next winter we'll stay there as long as you choose, but that will be the end of it. I have had so much of that sort of thing that I am tired of it."

"How did you expect to live here?" inquired Bella in a cold tone.

"Why, we shall be very well off now, and we can make a good many improvements in the park and castle and gardens. Then I shall look after the property myself—start the brick-kilns again, with new machinery, and perhaps go on with the tin mines which my father started. It would be quite interesting. And then, I am very fond of hunting. And you—well, you will certainly manage everything charmingly, and then you can ride and sometimes go hunting with me—and we are so fond of each other—and then—oh, a woman always has so many different things to interest her!"

"And then we shall go to Paris or Cannes very often, sha'n't we?" There was caressing suggestion in her voice. "And Hamburg. I am so fond of Hamburg! I know the nicest people there—lords and ladies and barons and even princes," she added emphatically.

"My dear Bella, that sounds so—" said Eberhard, with a nervous shudder. "Oh, yes, if you wish it."

"Don't you like to travel?"

"To tell the truth, I hate railroads and hotels."

"But we shall have a good many visitors at home?" asked Bella after something of a pause.

"Yes, of course; mamma and Elfrida will live in the garden wing, and then all summer we shall have relatives staying with us."

"Aunt Betty and Company?" Bella's tone was very sharp.

"Oh, yes," with a sigh. "And Aunt Betty is only a sample. We have hosts of them and they all count on staying at Riedenheim. But in the autumn we always have hunting, and Prince Ludwig Ferdinand and the hereditary Prince of Naumingen and half the regiment are invited."

"Ah, that will be fine. But I had expected to entertain as they do in England, where one has guests all the year around, except for a few weeks when one is in London."

"Hm, that would be dreadful! No, thank God, we don't do that here!" He shook his head gravely.

There was another pause. "I am rather tired," said Bella, rising. "I think I'll go upstairs and lie down for a while."

Bella excused herself from the early dinner, on the ground of a headache. Mrs. Simpkins had to make herself doubly agreeable. After dinner, Eberhard and an uncle, Count Jobst, who had been a diplomat and who had run down for the day, sat on the stone steps of the terrace, drinking coffee and cognac and smoking. Uncle Jobst was a white-haired old aristocrat whose experience in Washington and a dozen other capitals had given him wide experience.

"It was really very nice of you to come, Uncle Jobst," Eberhard was saying. "You have a much wider knowledge of the world than the people here. Do you know, though mamma has been so lovely, in her heart she thinks my marriage with a pretty, elegant American heiress a real mesalliance."

"Well, of course, that is a narrow way of looking at it. Your Bella belongs to the aristocracy of wealth, of cultivation—which may marry into the nobility of any country. It is so now, and it always has been so. The merchant family of Medici placed their Katherine and Marie on the French throne. The daughters of the Venetian bankers became reigning princesses; those of German merchant-princes married noblemen. It is nothing new."

"I am so glad that you approve of my engagement."

"But, my boy, I cannot remember your ever asking for my opinion in the matter, or my expressing any."

"Well, I mean—from what you say—and you were so charmed with them."

"I wasn't born yesterday. If you would really like to know my opinion—if you really want my opinion, I must say that I consider any marriage with a foreigner a misfortune."

"That is rather an extreme view of the matter."

"It's founded on my own experience of years, and I've had many opportunities for observation."

"And you have never seen a happy international marriage?"

"Oh, certainly I have, often. But I have also known an extremely happy marriage where the wife was an epileptic."

"But I must acknowledge that I like Bella's rather coquettish ways, her charming way of making one feel that one must not go a hair's breadth too far, and then—I am not sure that I care for an excess of temperament in my wife."

"Well, that's a matter of taste, but here comes the most serious question—the children. Of course, you marry to suit yourself, but you must think of your children in the second place. You are going to provide them with a mother who has fortune and beauty, but who seems destined to be an invalid."

Eberhard started up in amazement.

"The stimulating climate over there," continued Count Jobst, "is evolving from this mingling of blood a race that is handsome, but bred down too fine. A western girl, without a grandfather, has a more subtle nervous system than a born Parisian; daintier hands and feet than a European princess. They can hold their heads above the water only by a constant infusion of new, red, European blood and by plenty of fresh air sports. Then, too, by a mixed marriage you rob your children of a fatherland. The offspring of a mixed marriage is often extremely talented and attractive, but in the strict sense of the word it is homeless."

"I must acknowledge," admitted Eberhard in a depressed tone, "that I have lately had some misgivings, but Bella is so—you can't imagine—"

"Of course, my boy, I understand," said Uncle Jobst, clapping him jovially on the shoulder. "You mustn't mind my long sermon. You know how intimate I was with your father."

Eberhard rose suddenly and looked out at the rear door in surprise. "What does this mean?" he exclaimed. "They are carrying out some big trunks, and the maid is counting the pieces of luggage!"

Deficke, the servant, came up and handed a letter to Count Eberhard, saying in a low voice: "I have been looking for your highness everywhere."

As Eberhard tore open the letter the landau drove up.

"The young lady ordered the carriage for the four-forty-seven train," said Deficke. "The gracious countess has just left the foreign ladies' rooms, and seems much disturbed."

Doors shut and opened in the castle. While Eberhard was still staring at the paper in his hand, two female figures hurried across the terrace, and the dowager appeared at an upper window, not seeing the group below. "Where is my Eberhard?" she was saying.

Eberhard started, and whistled for his groom. "Saddle Gold Elsie, do you hear?" he ordered. "I am going to ride over to Hohenberg and spend the night at the forester's. I'll stay there till my leave is up. Well, you see it's all over, Uncle Jobst! She assures me of her unchanging friendship, and thanks us for all the kindness shown them—and bids us all good-bye! That's all. See, there they go now!"

The landau drove hastily by. The gentlemen bowed most punctiliously, and the ladies inclined their heads.

At ten that evening those who had been gathered about Bella and Eberhard were scattered. In the violet room in the castle Aunt Betty was saying consolingly: "So the gas-stove girl is gone! Thank God, that has been spared us!"

"What nonsense, my dear cousin," retorted the wise old princess. "Somebody else will be glad enough to snap up the gas-stove girl, though I am glad it has turned out as it has."

And the repentant Miss Marion added: "Count Eberhard and Miss Simpkins were utterly unsuited to each; but she is the most attractive person I ever met in my life."

In the dowager's bedroom Elfrida was saying: "Well, mamma, it was rather sudden, but it must be for the best."

The dowager bowed in assent.

Eberhard was riding hard, through a forest glade, and reflecting calmly: "Well, fortunately I shall not have to go begging for a wife. There are plenty of charming girls in Potsdam and Berlin. I had never felt inclined to marry before, but I was really fascinated by Bella." He sighed. "Still, there were a good many things to consider." He gave Gold Elsie the spur, and whistled a military air, musingly.

At the same hour Mrs. Simpkins was saying pathetically in a first-class carriage on the Frankfurt train: "Of course, you know best—but I wish you wouldn't change your mind so often. It's very hard on me, I'm sure!"

Bella explained pertly: "Oh, I'm in no hurry to get married!" To herself she reflected: "I believe I'll take Tommy Mason after all. He was always so nice the three years when we were supposed to be engaged, and we suited each other so well. Of course, Eberhard is far better looking—how absolutely angelic he was in that white coat and silver helmet! Fortunately, I kept all his photographs. And then the name! Imperial Countess Bella von Hilberg-Dahnitz-Riedenheim sounds rather different from Mrs. Thomas B. Mason. But even with the castle thrown in, I couldn't stand it. And Tommy hates America, and would be willing to live in Paris or Cannes or Florence always; and he is from Boston and knows all the best people there, and one of his sisters is Lady Molly Borgia. So there are some compensations."

She arranged the silken cushions and calmly went back to the novel which she had begun two days before.

The Physicians of the Murine Eye Remedy Company, Chicago, U. S. A., Oculists of years' standing, carefully prepare "The Murine Eye Remedies" in the Company's Laboratory. These Remedies are the result of their Clinical, Hospital and Private Practice, and they have found from their years of experience with Children's Eyes, that two drops of Murine in each Eye of the Growing Child is of inestimable value. Murine is an Eye Tonic and they know, if it is used regularly, that it Tones the Eye of the Growing Child and in many instances obviates the use of Glasses, and is it not reasonable that Glasses when not required will retard the development of a young and growing Eye?

Murine, through its Tonic effect, Stimulates Healthy Circulation and thus promotes the normal development of the Eye. We do not believe there is a Mother who has used Murine in her own Eyes and in the Eyes of the members of her family who would be without it, or who is not willing to speak of its Merits as The Household Friend.

The Child in the Schoolroom needs Murine. Murine contains no harmful or prohibited Drugs, and conforms to the Laws of the Country.

Druggists everywhere will supply Murine and tell you of its gratifying results.

The treatment is original, the percentage of cures is great and is purely osteopathic.

Take the spinal column made up of the twenty-four vertebrae, joined to the head above, the pelvis below, which encloses and protects the spinal cord. Between the vertebrae is the cartilage, the elasticity of which softens the many jars when it is in its normal condition. Over bone are cartilage and ligaments, firmly holding them in place. Gross displacements and fractures are frequent from great violence and receive prompt attention; but this complicated piece of machinery suffers in a thousand ways without notice until some weakened organ, deprived of nourishment or elimination, cries out with pain and is turned over for surgical attention.

The spine by all laws of physics is momentarily liable to get out of mechanical adjustment; it is subject to slips, wrenches, pressures, dead locks, contractions and congestions—all of which require an intelligent engineer to adjust, to relieve and to cure.

That specialist when Nature comes to a standstill, and cannot regain the normal is the osteopathic physician.

Nervous System

Stretched along the sides of the spine within the cavity of the chest and abdomen, and running the entire length of this back bone, are the ganglionated cords of the sympathetic nervous system. The solar plexus or "abdominal brain" is the central power house which furnishes energy for all the involuntary activities of the body. All the organs of the body, but not the voluntary muscular system, are sustained, operated and controlled by this sympathetic system.

This system of double nerve strands passes across and upon the head of each rib where it is fastened with limited motion to its own vertebra. At this point there is a ganglion of sympathetic cells on each side corresponding with the number of the vertebra from which one or more of the strands go to the spinal cord.

These regulate the blood supply to the spinal cord. Upon the integrity of these minute connecting sympathetic fibres depends the nutrition of these all-important spinal centers which reciprocally control nutrition and voluntary activities of the rest of the body.

These spinal centers control the functions of the body. Physiology teaches that there is a breathing center which, being punctured or deprived of blood, causes death; the heart centers controlled with opposing impulses, one to increase, the other to check the heart's action; a temperature center and the very important "vaso motor center" which causes contraction and dilation of blood vessels throughout the body.

Osteopathy has located other centers along the spine, and discovered the pathways by which to reach them, and the manipulations by which the various functions can be controlled.

It now becomes apparent how breathing, digestion, secretion, absorption, excretion, circulation of the blood and lymph, urination, defecation, menstruation, procreation, parturition and all other processes of life specialized in and dependent upon one or other of these centers of the spinal column lie within reach and become subject to the control of the osteopathic fingers.

As anatomical practitioners, the osteopaths have learned that most diseases are traceable to or at least inseparably associated with abnormal conditions at spinal centers.

They go direct to the spot—to these power houses of living energy—to find and remedy the evil. The osteopath's medicine is medicinal correction—not drugging. Osteopathy means adjustment.

Auto Notes

Many automobiles have various evidences to offer of their easy riding qualities. Probably the best however is that recently obtained by the White Steamer whereby it is found that this car has been converted into a "napping" conveyance for President Taft. The President under the stress of his official duties finds it necessary often to give a large portion of his nights to work. His ability to do this and at the same time retain his healthfulness is largely attributed to the fact that he utilizes practically every possible moment for napping. This is particularly so with him when motoring and his White Steamer is daily called upon to fill the double purpose of affording him a means of fresh air recreation and a place for a mid-day nap. Reclining peacefully in his seat the chief executive often continues to sleep in spite of the fact that the car is reeling off 45 miles an hour.

C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of the Diamond Rubber Co., has just returned from a hunting outing to the 22,000 acre De Von ranch in the vicinity of famous Fort Steward, Humboldt County. The Rambler car, which traveled some exceedingly rough roads wore Diamond equipment and suffered but one puncture during the trip.

"In their astonishment at the marvelous advancements in the construction of the cars themselves," says H. D. McCoy, secretary of the Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co., "the public often loses sight of a like development going on in every line of automobile accessories. As a matter of fact all motor supplies are achieving greater qualities of comfort and efficiency quite as wonderful as the immediate growth of the motor car in itself. This is probably as noticeable in automobile tires as anywhere else. Dr. Jerome Gardner who drives a Hudson called on us recently and stated that the Hartfords which equipped his machine all around had already done 9,000 miles and appeared good for much additional service."

John Dacha of Oakland has just completed a strenuous run with his Chalmers "30" to Coalinga via Hollister over the San Benito River road which is known as the worst stretch of going in the State. On the whole trip Mr. Dacha says that no adjustment of any kind was made. Over 500 miles were covered.

Lee Ijams of the local branch of the Diamond Rubber Company has just left for a two-weeks' hunting and fishing trip to the Lake Tahoe section. He is accompanied by a party of friends. Ijams is an expert hunter and expects to bag a buck or two before his return.

H. E. Doty, assistant Pacific Coast manager of the White Company, reports that Geo. Brackett of Portland, Oregon, has just wired an order to the San Francisco branch for a 1911 model White Gasoline car. The machine is to have a specially constructed torpedo body finished in blue and cream.

H. L. Keats, one of the best known automobile men in the Northwest and distributor of Chalmers and Hudson cars, has been in town as a guest of E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Company. Keats states that he has never witnessed anything so phenomenal as the big demand developed for both Chalmers and Hudson cars throughout the Northwest this season.

A telegram just forwarded to the Pioneer Automobile Company states that the trophy for the Brooklyn Times 400 mile two-day reliability run has just been awarded to the Hudson roadster driven by William H. A. Burns. The car made a perfect score.

The Pioneer Automobile Company reports the following sales for the past week: Chalmers "40"—C. A. Zacharias, Modesto; A. C. Wheeler, Fresno; J. L. Whitmore, Stockton, Cal.; Hudson Runabout—A. W. Schultz, Caruthers; John Gregory, San Francisco; W. T. Blair, New Castle; Bert Dingley, Modesto; Hudson Touring—R. G. Fowler, Gilroy; Bancroft & Richardson, Oakland; Chester G. Myers, San Francisco; C. Parker Holt, San Francisco; G. L. Weathers, Visalia; Lozier—Mrs. J. H. Brown, Oakland, Cal.; Wilcox Truck—Pacific Hardware & Steel Co., San Francisco.

According to C. H. Davies, president of the Western Pacific Motor Car Co., automobile contests show the true merits of any car only when the season's performance of that car is averaged, winnings and failures alike.

1911 CHALMERS MOTOR CARS

WILL ARRIVE AUGUST 15th

Refined But Practically Unchanged

1909 and 1910 Good Enough

The Chalmers cars come from a factory producing quality and not quantity. THE CHALMERS PRINCIPLE is not to make as many cars as possible, but TO MAKE EACH INDIVIDUAL CAR AS GOOD AS POSSIBLE.

We regret that we were not able to furnish 1909 and 1910 models to all who wanted them, and while we fear that some were offended when told that they could not get the cars they wanted, we assure every one that it is much harder to tell a prospective buyer that he cannot have the car than it is to show him why he should have one.

It is possible that the Chalmers factory could build a sufficient number of cars to take care of every available customer, but in so doing they would, like a large number of other factories, sacrifice quality for quantity, and every car sold would not make a customer for another, as has been our experience during the past two years.

A few cars are still available for September delivery.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 22,710

MARIA MORTARA, Plaintiff, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The people of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting.

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Maria Mortara, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Beginning at a point on the southerly line of Chestnut Street distant thereon one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet six (6) inches westerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Chestnut Street with the westerly line of Pierce Street, and running thence westerly along said line of Chestnut Street twenty-seven (27) feet, six (6) inches; thence at a right angle southerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet, six (6) inches; thence at a right angle easterly twenty-seven (27) feet six (6) inches; and thence at a right angle northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet six (6) inches to the point of beginning.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interest and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and seal of said Court this 22nd day of August, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

(Seal) By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk

Memorandum—The first publication of this Summons was made in Town Talk newspaper on the 27th day of August, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff: Names, J. J. Rauer Addresses, 244 Kearny St., San Francisco, California.

DEVOTO, RICHARDSON & DEVOTO, Attys. for Plaintiff, 68 Post street, San Francisco, California. 8-27-10

Since its recent arrival the Owen has become one of the most discussed cars on the local field and everything indicates that it will be one of next season's biggest sellers among the highest class machines. Delivery of one of these cars has just been made by S. G. Chapman to O. H. Lacey, the well known capitalist of Hanford.

SUMMONS

the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 22,624.

HUGO G. POHEIM, ARTHUR T. POHEIM, KATHIE POCKWITZ and LEO POCKWITZ (her husband), Plaintiffs, vs. All Persons Claiming any Interest in, or on Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or any Part Thereof, Defendants.

Action in rem brought against all the world in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the complaint filed in said City and County the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Hugo G. Poheim, Arthur T. Poheim, Kathie H. Pockwitz and Leo Pockwitz (her husband), the above-named plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

That certain lot of land, with the improvements thereon, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly bounded and described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at the point where the westerly line of Valencia Street intersects the northerly line of Twenty-first Street; thence running westerly on said northerly line of Twenty-first Street ninety (90) feet; thence at right angles northerly fifty (50) feet; thence at right angles westerly thirty (30) feet; thence at right angles easterly and parallel with Twenty-first Street one hundred and ten (110) feet to the westerly line of Valencia Street; and thence at right angles southerly along said line of Valencia Street eighty-eight (88) feet to said northerly line of Twenty-first Street, a point of commencement; being a part of Mission Block Number Seventy-three (73).

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: The judgment of said Court establishing plaintiffs' title to said real property and determining all adverse claims thereto, and declaring plaintiffs to be the owners in fee simple absolute of all the above described real property and each and every part thereof free and clear of any liens or encumbrances, and for general relief and costs of suit.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 15th day of August, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

Letters

The Child and Literature

The perennial discussion of The Child and Literature is again to the fore, the educator having discovered once more that the twentieth century boys and girls do not read Scott, and some means must be devised to force them to it. If they refuse to swallow the old fashioned bolus they must be coaxed to down the modern sugar-coated pellet, but Scott, or the concentrated essence of Scott they must have, willy-nilly, whether or no. It may be impertinent to ask why, but nevertheless, one would like to know. The particular difficulty just now appears to be with "Ivanhoe," but the same trouble has been encountered with Dickens and Thackeray, to say nothing of Shakespeare. No one seems to have thought of the simple plan of ascertaining whether doses of the Victorian novelists are necessary to the welfare of the children of the present generation, or, on discovering that life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness are not endangered, adopting the plan of letting them alone. One does not pursue the plan of capturing children and cramming food down their throats by force under the delusion that in no other way can their bodies be nourished and it is difficult to understand why their minds should be put under such a system of cramming. The plain truth is that in the endeavor to mark out a royal road to learning everything has been so simplified, so decorated and adorned, that the children of to-day lack the stimulus of contrast. They are coaxed and wheedled and amused until they are surfeited. Being overfed with sweets their minds are sluggish, and between arithmetic cake, history pie, geography pudding and story book jam there is not enough difference to excite interest or desire. One recalls those pathetic infants, Marion Hill's "Pettison Twins," properly costumed and sent out to play in their antiseptic sand pile, timed by the clock, and their listless disgust of the exercise under parental supervision, as contrasted with the ecstatic joy of the one week when, owing to a miscarriage of well arranged plans, they found themselves under the care of an old negro mammy who understood the art of judiciously letting them alone. What the children of this age need is more real work in school, spelling books to master, problems in arithmetic to be reasoned out and geography and grammar to be conned. They need their library privileges curtailed and more books owned in the home, where they will be always available. The majority of the homes today are bookless and parental advice is apt to be lacking. Mothers and fathers persuade themselves that they have no time to bother with children's books and the young generation is left to its own devices. Teachers advise, persuade and command, but it is human nature to disregard injunctions and books read under compulsion have as little effect as promises extracted under duress. On the other hand, children commend to each other what has pleased them, and they discuss characters and incidents in the dime novels and trashy juveniles as they never have an opportunity with their elders in connection with the better class of books forced upon them. The length of the older novels is a deterrent in itself, for school children having lessons and other interests, cannot devote all their time to reading and a book which must be back on the library shelves in a week or a fortnight must not be too long for perusal within that limit. Moreover, there is something to be said on the subject of the child's argument that they find the classics "prosy." A large part of the descriptive matter which was so novel and entertaining to grandfathers has become commonplace now through iteration and the cheap processes of reproduction not to mention the picture post card, have rendered it possible to take in at a single glance what used to require pages of print to set forth, but for all that, the modernized children's editions and expurgated young-people's editions should be anathema. Not only is there nothing left of the author's style and phraseology, the only reason why one author should be preferred to another, but the very plots, the relationships of the characters and their motives are changed in order to "preserve the innocence" of children who read the daily papers and pore over all the published details of suicides, murders and elopements, while the very class of educators and club women who clamor most strenuously for expurgated editions are just as loud in their demand for class teaching on that most delicate of all subjects, the morals of sex. It is not at all easy to understand why reading has come to be exalted into such a prime virtue. Charles Lamb was of the opinion that the more one filled the mind with the thoughts of others the less room there was left for thoughts of his own. One can hardly imagine any of the great inventors and discoverers continually occupying himself in contemplation of what some one else has said upon subjects alien to him. It was Emerson's advice to "buy books in the line of your genius," and before condemning the boys and girls of today it might be well to discover whether the books they are said to reject do lie within the scope of what genius they possess. In any case nothing save indigestion will result from the cramming process. Most of us adults have a loathing for some article of wholesome food because we have partaken of it under untimely circumstances and there is no more certain way to teach a child to loathe books than to force him to read under the delusion that it will benefit him. Our good forbears took little account of the stimulus of the locked book case, as they little dreamed that the locked jam closet led to many a theft therefrom. If children will not read good books, let us see to it that they have no access to poisonous or worthless ones and leave them alone. With more real work to do in school and fewer free libraries to patronize at liberty, book-hunger would lead them in the right direction provided that good books were within easy reach.

Cleaning London

Over 65,840,000 gallons of water were used last year in washing and watering the streets of the City of London.

The quantity of refuse removed from the city by the corporation during the year was 51,821 van loads taken from premises, and 28,930 loads of sweepings from the public way, making a total of 80,759 loads, or about 263 per working day.

The sum of $1395 was received from the sale of refuse collected from street orderly bins, and old tins were disposed of for $905.

During the past year over two miles of derelict or disused overhead wires across the city streets were removed by the city engineers' officials, making twenty-five miles during the past ten years. The number of private owners of overhead wires in the city is 141. In all, about 733,956 spans of wire cross the public thoroughfares, and during the last twelve months 5,765 cases of broken wires were reported. The city engineer mentions in his report the erection, for experimental purposes, of various aerial lines for the purpose of intercepting wireless telegraphic messages.

Thousand Oaks

Berkeley

On All Three Lines of the Southern Pacific Electric

The Southern Pacific has announced that trains will be running to THOUSAND OAKS by March 1st via Shattuck Ave., California Street and Ninth Street three distinct routes.

Do you realize what that will mean for this beautiful residence Park? Property values will double, yes, triple when these trains start running, because the most favored spot of Berkeley—THOUSAND OAKS—the great natural park on the North Berkeley Hills, will be 35 minutes from San Francisco and 5 minutes from the University.

THOUSAND OAKS is the same distance from the entrance to the University as Claremont, being within the mile and a half circle.

If the trains were running today a home-site in THOUSAND OAKS would be worth from $50 to $75 a front foot. Right now, six months before the trains, you can have your choice of this property at from $25 to $35 a front foot; but we don't say these prices will prevail for any length of time.

See this property at once and you will appreciate its grandeur and worth. One-tenth down and one per cent a month, with no interest nor taxes for two years—the easiest terms offered in California today.

Make your reservations as soon as possible; the property is selling very rapidly.

is the better kind of oatmeal

"The taste is the test"

Let Us Tell You About It

H-O oatmeal is manufactured from the highest grade of selected oats. After removing all foreign matter, the meat of the oat is subjected to a very high temperature, and by our own patented process is cooked for several hours under heavy steam pressure. This steam-cooking dextrinizes the starch and renders the oats easily digestible.

H-O oatmeal is ready for the breakfast table after from 15 to 20 minutes' boiling, and provides an inviting dish of sweet, clean, separate, tender kernels. Possibly the "other" kind may be cheaper; but as soon as you have tested and appreciated the quality of H-O oatmeal, you will gladly pay the few cents difference.

A Call for Tarpey

All the way from Mexico and from the facile hand of the Hon. M. F. Tarpey comes an epistle to the people of Fresno protesting against giving the slightest encouragement to the Prohibition propaganda which has been evincing symptoms of enthusiasm since the primary election. Mr. Tarpey is a very fine writer. He has made an excellent contribution to epistolary literature. But he is also a master of the art of politics, an effective campaigner, a veteran organizer, and by the exercise of the talents that have won distinction for him as a party leader he can do more toward retarding the progress of prohibition sentiment in this State than by writing letters of protest. Our advice to Mr. Tarpey is to come home and get in touch with the situation that confronts not only the vineyardists of California but all men engaged in the various important industries to which total abstinence is inimical. When he returns he will find that there has been something doing in his absence. Those long-haired gentlemen in the Southern part of the State who are forever damning the sins they're not inclined to have been taking a very active interest in Republican politics. Sunday baseball and alcoholic stimulants are their pet aversions. And they are heartily in favor of the election of the candidate, who, before the primary election cunningly appealed to them by announcing that as one of his opponent was supported by the saloon-keepers and another by the Royal Arch it behooved him to cultivate the confidence of an element which it was needless for him to name. It is currently reported that the Prohibitionists have one of their own number running for an office in which he will be able to render the cause valuable service. So if Mr. Tarpey has interests that may be damaged by the kind of legislation that Prohibitionists demand he should lose no time in getting on the firing line. We believe he is still a Democrat, and therefore we feel that it will not be hard for him to espouse with all the warmth of his soul the principles of his party.

Logical Inconsistency

The New York Sun has taken occasion to contrast the attitude "of the most honest of all living men and the most courteous of gentlemen" toward Senator Lorimer with the attitude of the same illustrious personage toward the Hon. Eugene Schmitz. In making this contrast the Sun betrays its utter ignorance of the quintessence of all Colonel Roosevelt's moral and political policies. The Sun thinks it strange that "the same honest and fastidious man" who invited Eugene Schmitz to a White House reception in honor of the Army and Navy League should have become so sensitive to his social surroundings as to be constrained while the guest of a club to ordain the exclusion of a member therefrom. The Colonel's latter day sensitiveness is considered all the more remarkable in view of the fact that Senator Lorimer is not under indictment whereas for three months previous to the time of the issuance of the invitation to Schmitz that individual had notoriously been under indictment for a despicable form of political and personal iniquity. The inference that the Sun would point is obvious enough. From this contrast of conduct it is clear that Colonel Roosevelt is an inconsistent performer. But why waste words in supererogation? If the Sun had drawn the contrast to exemplify the principle that persons most sensitive to disgrace from without are usually most callous to what is wrong in themselves the performance would not be without merit, but to take the pains to convict T. R. of inconsistency is as ridiculous in its excess as to paint the lily or seek the beauteous eye of heaven to garnish. Mutability of temper is the Colonel's most salient characteristic. But his inconsistencies and incongruities are not conclusive of insincerity. In his very inconsistencies he is often absolutely consistent with his cardinal principle. Such is the case in this instance. His cardinal principle is that the end justifies the means. When he invited Eugene Schmitz to a White House reception he was eager to conciliate, to coddle, to captivate the indicted mayor. At that time international complications had grown out of anti-Japanese agitation in San Francisco, and the President, on the anxious seat, believed that Schmitz could assuage his emotions. Hence his indifference in those parlous days to indictments and all forms of accusation. And now while it is true that Senator Lorimer is not under indictment, figuring as he is in a big scandal it was natural that out of the circumstances in which he is placed inspiration should come to the most fertile of all employers of theatrical expedients. When Colonel Roosevelt called all the world to witness his abhorrence of the kind of politics that Senator Lorimer is believed to have practiced he was engaged, according to his own testimony, in advertising the Outlook magazine by concentrating all the rays of the limelight on the adorable personality of one of its contributing editors. As a means to this end nothing better could have been devised than the sensational, melodramatic demand for the exclusion of Senator Lorimer from his own club.

A Mischievous Precedent

The precedent established by Colonel Roosevelt in the Lorimer episode though more or less sanctified by its author is not to be rashly followed by every Tom, Dick and Harry in this prosaic, workaday world. The principle of it is fraught with the most ugly consequences. It's the principle of lynch law. To this principle may be attributed many of the barbaric and fiendish cruelties practiced by the wanton and unspeakable demagogues of the French Revolution and applauded by an inflamed and bloodthirsty people. None but a Roosevelt is justified in acting on this lawless principle; for it presupposes that divine sense of intuition peculiar only to those epochal beings who have walked with God. For the peace of mind of all of us it is advisable that we should not place absolute confidence on our senses in judging of our fellow-men when our judgment carries with it some awful penalty. We are constantly being misled by the irrefutable argument of circumstance. This argument addresses itself to us in the Lorimer case; but we are not to suppose that Colonel Roosevelt's judgment is based on nothing more than color of circumstance. Were such the case his judgment would not command our respect. For we can recall another case the circumstance of which are parallel to those of the Lorimer case, and we happen to know that the gentleman who profited from corruption had no hand in the crime that was committed. We allude to the case of Senator Bard. Legislators were bribed to vote for Mr. Bard, and he was elected, and he had no hand in the bribery, no knowledge of the commission of the bribery. The crime was committed not out of love for Bard but out of enmity to Daniel M. Burns. We doubt whether to this day Bard could be convinced that his election was procured by dishonest means. Yet in the history of senatorial elections in this State there is nothing of which there can be less doubt than that legislators were bribed to withdraw their support from the man whose defeat meant the election of Mr. Bard. If any one of these men confessed today that he had been bribed, and the principle enunciated by Colonel Roosevelt were to be applied, Mr. Bard, an absolutely innocent man, would be made to suffer a most grievous and cruel injustice.

Chanler Versus Cavalieri

Bob Chanler reminds one of the cow that gives a full pail of milk and then kicks it over. After doing all that was necessary to immortalize himself as a lover, with bovine perversity he stamped himself an unpardonable cad. He has himself fleeced at for signing away his birthright for love, but that is probably the most creditable thing he ever did. If he had done nothing more he might have taken rank with the world's greatest lovers, with Petrarch and Dante, with great Antony enthralled, the Roman lion in leash led captive into Alexandria. Assuming that all the world loves a lover what cant there was in the first instalment of criticism evoked by the news that Chanler had yielded up a fortune in the mad intoxication, the soft transporting joy of a beautiful woman's melting and ravishing kiss! Was this not evidence of that grand passion to which we are indebted for all the romance that has mitigated the tedium of this commonplace world? To be sure it was. Yet Chanler was considered a fit object of ridicule because he impoverished himself for the sake of a woman who only toyed with his emotions, whose smiles were theatrical, whose embraces were but the artifices of a simulated affection. As though this circumstance in anywise detracted from the glory of his performance! The grandness of the grand passion is in proportion to the self-sacrifice it induces regardless of whether it is reciprocated. It was Chanler's good fortune to have a beautiful woman exercise an imperious sway over his imagination and do something more than tolerate his wooing. He was imprudent, but such is the privilege of love. "She was the moon and he the man." In the days of chivalry when scars were love-symbols the gallant lover with steel helmet and plume of feathers, barbed steed and spread banner, performing knightly service in joust and tournament, vindicated his passion by physical hazards sought and braved. Times have changed.

In this commercial age the primal passion can best be expressed only in terms of the counting-house. And the lover who parts with all his gold for a kiss gives no stronger testimony of passion than the knight of old who paid court to a fair one's eyebrow and unhorsed adversaries in mortal combat, stormed castles and vanquished giants. In those good old medieval days when men held their souls captive to the brief inebriation of love, never stopping to resolve the metaphysical question whether their passion was grounded in instinct or sentiment, the world did not deride. Nay, the world applauded. The world regarded the kiss as the crown of earthly blessing—such a kiss as the beautiful Cavalieri vouchsafed Bob Chanler. For that the romantic lover would sacrifice even his post-mortem prospect of eternal bliss. Nor was it necessary for him to be assured that his love would be reciprocated. Many of the fair ones who incited the knights of romance to deeds of heroism were impetuous women who had no time to be virtuous. That they would finally settle down and be good was but a prospect that stimulated the gambling spirit among their impassioned adorers. How sordid then, how unreasonable, for this modern lover, now that he has had his kiss to demand the return of his money! And now that he has made the demand how shall the question at issue be adjudicated? If kisses are to be degraded to the level of butter and steel rails, the price regulated by the law of supply and demand and the civil courts employed to arbitrate questions over which the goddess of the swan-drawn chariot claims exclusive jurisdiction then indeed have we fallen upon evil times. We do not mind confessing that we have not the slightest sympathy with the scheme to compel the beautiful Cavalieri to return the price of her kiss, or in other words—if we may be permitted to employ so vulgar an infinitive in this connection—to disgorge the golden pledge of a disenchanted lover. We believe that the value of a kiss is whatever the lady appraises it at. The only persons competent to give testimony on the subject of kisses are the poets, and from what we have learned from them we conclude that it is impossible for that mysterious compound of richest nectar and ambrosial dew to come too high. Ovid tells us that by a kiss he was redeemed from the stygian vale. Surely Ovid got his money's worth at any price. "Leave but a kiss in the cup, and I'll not ask for wine" sang Ben Jonson, who thus poetically affirmed a kiss to be more valuable than all else. Tennyson tells us of a kiss that drew a whole soul through a woman's lips. Now Chanler himself confesses that Cavalieri through her adorable lips drew the great bulk of his chattels and hereditaments. That must have been such a kiss as Siegfried gave to Brunnhilde. And yet the welcher wants his money back! To everlasting infamy, say we to the man who bought that which the bard tells us provoketh thieves sooner than gold, and then tore the veil aside so that all the world might view the silent rites and solemn mysteries in the temple of Venus. He was mad, his friends say. Of course he was mad. Love and insanity are inseparable. The judgment of this Court of Love is that the consideration was ample and that Phryne is entitled to the costs of action.

History for the Prurient

Writers of the kind of fiction that makes quick and sure appeal to pruriency are threatened with competition from pseudo-historians. Pornography is now masquerading as history. Several imitators of Suetonius have sprung up in London, and for raciness they far surpass the author of "The Lives of the Caesars." Suetonius has many pages that are not at all interesting to readers who care for nothing but boudoir episodes and illustrations of a lewd and lascivious nature, but "Le Petit Homme Rouge" author of "The Favorites of Henry of Navarre," which came the other day from the press of Chando & Windus, is sprightly and salacious from cover to cover. Henry of Navarre was one of the greatest warriors and diplomatists of his time, but Le Petite Homme Rouge dwells not on achievements that are merely of philosophic interest. No tedious recital does he bore his sympathetic readers with; nor with the dry-as-dust details of affairs of State. The temple of Delight for him, where his sportive hero indulges his purple passion for wanton women with loving eyes of flame, for fair ladies fashioned for ecstasy and skilled in all the devices of amorous dalliance. In an appendix is given a list of the ladies who figured in the life of "the most amorous of French kings." There were sixty of them but not all of them accepted his addresses. Henry occasionally slipped up. Similar in tone and treatment to the book published by Chando & Windus is "The Fascinating Duc de Richelieu" from Methuen's press. It purports to be a history of "the most notorious Lovelace of his age, who extended his conquests from the coulisses of the opera to the steps of the Throne, whom Princesses of the blood consoled when a prisoner in the Bastille, and for the possession of whose heart titled dames contended with pistols in the Bois de Boulogne." We are told that it is far from being "a chronique scandaleuse"; which causes us to wonder what it would be were it such in the opinion of the author. For it abounds in love affairs of not the slightest historical interest. We are told of wantons who had many liaisons, and we see no reason for their introduction, unless it were the design of the author to exploit the turgid trade of harlotry in so far as it was promoted by some of the lascivious bucks of history. Another work of the same character is the autobiography of Princess Helene von Racowitza, published by Constable. The princess glories in her amorous propensities and tells us that "she has not for one moment repented of her naive abandonment amid the scent of blossoms and the song of nightingales." The excuse for this book is that the brazen courtesan was involved in the affairs of Ferdinand Lassalle. Insincere works of this character remind us of the ingenious subterfuge of art by which the theatre exploits indecency under the masks of literary skill and the crafts of realism. They certainly reflect no credit on the houses that are responsible for their publication.

Her Only Fault

She has so many matchless charms
Time fails me to recite them.
Had I a pen of shorthand speed
'Twould take a week to write them.
She's fair of figure, fair of face,
And even the most spiteful
Admit her loveliness and grace—
In short she's just delightful.

Her mental faculties are keen,
She's wonderfully witty.
She's something more than a fair doll
And not just merely pretty.
Yet one thing all my ardor checks—
I cannot but disclose it—
She is the fairest of her sex,
But, oh, good Lord! she knows it!

Perspective Impressions

The Republicans of New York appear to be somewhat disinclined to follow the lead of their more enlightened brethren of Kansas, Oklahoma and California.

Did Mahomet go to the Mountain, or is the Mountain at Oyster Bay?

Colonel Roosevelt has been defending his right to criticise the courts. No sensible person challenges this right. But there are many persons demanding the impossible—that T. R. stick to the facts.

The Union Iron Works will not build any war vessels for China while labor conditions in this city remain as at present.

A Boston millionaire has discovered that sand is a cure for dyspepsia. It has long been known as a cure for weak backs.

It is beginning to dawn on the perceptive faculties of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League leaders that it might be worth their while to promote harmony. But the air is still full of jangling discords.

"Defeat won't feaze me," said Roosevelt on Monday, but on Tuesday he braved the dangers of the deep in a storm to reach President Taft's side and solicit his support.

Now that Lu Etta Smith is on her way back to testify against Dr. Burke the Republican candidate for Governor may have to call a halt in his campaign. But perhaps he would rather forfeit his fee than let the whole State know that he repudiates the principle of other days, the principle that holds it to be wrong for a lawyer to defend men charged with revolting crimes.

The Roosevelt Reaction

(The most significant of recent happenings in national politics was the Taft-Roosevelt conference held last Monday. This conference was of Mr. Roosevelt's own seeking. It is conclusive of a change of attitude on the part of the ex-President. The reason of this change of attitude may be found in the following correspondence of the New York Sun of Tuesday of last week from Rochester, N. Y. From this analysis of an interesting situation it appears that it behooved Mr. Roosevelt to get busy and mend his fences.—Editor Town Talk.)

Rochester, Sept. 12.—Monroe County offers unusual opportunities for analyzing the new crusade against bossism in the State. Here is a county which a few months ago was all aflame with anti-boss insurgency. Here is a city which absolutely and with violence repudiated bossism and its boss, George W. Aldridge. A struggle so recent might be expected to leave behind it the elements of a permanent fight for political freedom; indeed, Rochester might well be expected to be a headquarters of insurgency.

The astonishing fact is, however, that in the next State convention at Saratoga George W. Aldridge will rise and cast the thirty-eight votes of Monroe County against Theodore Roosevelt and for the old guard, and his action will have the approval of his constituents, for in Monroe County at least the advent of Theodore Roosevelt has extinguished the local fight against bosses, or at least postponed it indefinitely. The Republicans who fought and defeated Mr. Aldridge a few months ago are prepared to fight him again, but not on the issue of New Nationalism and not to advance an attack upon the Supreme Court.

Here, then, in Monroe County the reaction against Roosevelt is the single potent element in the situation. As recently as six weeks ago there survived enough of the resentment against Aldridge born of the recent Congress campaign to endanger his political control. On the issues raised by Governor Hughes, or rather in a fight for Governor Hughes against Boss Aldridge, the dissatisfaction with the Republican party as now controlled would have produced a contest scarcely equaled in local political history.

This was six weeks ago. Today there is hardly a smoldering ember of insurgency visible. To the men who fought the recent fight there is a greater menace than local passion. To the newspapers, the independent voters, the Republicans with certain ideals above partisanship who united to defeat the local boss the Western excursion of Mr. Roosevelt, his speeches, his declarations, have been a distinct revelation. Automatically these speeches have operated to eliminate the most influential, the most earnest of those who fought the battle against the boss in Rochester last spring.

Wherever you turn in this city the same testimony is at hand. The heart has gone out of the insurgent movement, the energy, the civic interest which characterized the campaign for James S. Havens and against George W. Aldridge is lacking. Sympathy with the old guard does not exist. No one likes Barnes, believes in Ward or cares to see Vice-President Sherman win for his own sake. The resentment against George W. Aldridge has far from vanished; but in this particular fight Rochester is satisfied to let its old boss cast its votes because it is against the Roosevelt agitation with an even more emphatic unanimity.

If Monroe County is a fair sample of the counties of the State this Roosevelt reaction has already had prompt and serious effect upon the anti-boss sentiment. It is not that the local politicians say with apparent frankness that what seemed hard a month ago is easy now, that a situation potentially dangerous has become harmless. Their testimony might be prejudiced; but up and down the business street the testimony of all the various witnesses, politically varying, is the same: "I'm against bosses, I'm against Barnes and the old guard, but I'm not for New Nationalism. I am not in favor of the Wild West show." This comment is heard on every hand.

In Rochester, then, when a fight against bosses was half finished successfully the sudden eruption of Roosevelt has ended it. In effect Theodore Roosevelt has saved George W. Aldridge from a fight that his friends viewed with apprehension. The Hughes element, the independent element, all those peculiar combinations which elected James S. Havens, have deliberately stopped fighting. They are still against bosses, but in the present situation they see a danger far more serious than that incident to bosses.

On all sides there is unanimous agreement that Mr. Roosevelt is today weaker as a political leader than he was when he began his Western trip. If he has won the West there is in Rochester and Buffalo unmistakable evidence that he has lost certain important elements of strength for his alleged independent fight in New York. The vocabulary in which the Western exploits are described is limited; a dozen men use the same objection to describe the words and the acts of Mr. Roosevelt at Denver and in Kansas; and the words are short and frankly ugly.

It is indeed not exaggeration to say that a very considerable faction of the people in this end of the State are dismayed and frightened by the revelation of purposes and character. It has dwarfed the boss issue, this revelation; it has obscured Hughes and direct primaries, it has become something more to be feared and fought than the old guard or the locally unpopular manipulator of party machinery. So far as Rochester is concerned it has absolutely crushed the most hopeful attack in ten years upon George W. Aldridge.

That the members of the old guard have already felt this is unmistakable. They have always expected to win in the convention; they are now confident of winning safely. In this reaction which they have already felt they see the opportunity to strengthen themselves at home; and in Rochester today George W. Aldridge is stronger than before he opposed Mr. Roosevelt in the State committee meeting. As between Roosevelt and Aldridge it seems fairly clear that at the moment the people of Rochester, the Republicans of Rochester, believe Roosevelt the greater danger.

Coincidentally with the reaction comes the decline in the character of the contest consequent on the withdrawal of the independents. It is degenerating into a petty and corrupt struggle between factional politicians in such counties as Niagara, for example. The moral element has gone out with the introduction of what is recognized to be dangerous demagoguery. All that was best in the Hughes movement has quit the Roosevelt campaign in disgust. In the name of purity and reform delegates are now being bought and sold for purposes of local control, not in Monroe and Erie but in counties that adjoin them.

In the same way it becomes correspondingly clear that if Mr. Roosevelt succeeds in stampeding the Republican State Convention and landing the job he desires the convention will stay stamped until he is nominated. If the Republican party is to be committed to the New Nationalism the single and simple determination of the opponents of the doctrine and its inventor is that both shall be tested together. Not Hotchkiss, not Clark Williams, not Seth Low, not William L. Willcox or any other minor nomination is to be permitted to present inadequately the great cause.

So far as this part of the State is concerned the boss issue is dead. It is dead in Buffalo because the local boss is leading the anti-boss fight; it is dead in Rochester because it is recognized as a minor matter, an unimportant detail in the situation. The real issue is that of New Nationalism. If Mr. Roosevelt wins at Saratoga he will have the opportunity to write it into his platform and make the fight for himself. A platform commitment abolishing the Supreme Court will not be refused him if he takes the convention and elects himself the temporary chairman, but the commitment he must himself take to the people.

Here, then, is the situation, less apparent in Buffalo because the local boss has avoided the possible anti-boss issue by playing "practical" politics, but actually visible everywhere. The voice of Osawatimie and Denver has not aroused the applause in Monroe and Erie that it did in the West. On the contrary it has served to obscure all details hitherto important. They are not talking about bossism or arguing about direct primaries in western New York. They are talking about New Nationalism—and Mayor Gaynor, Roosevelt and Gaynor, that is what it comes down to.

In the meantime if you were to cast a balance it would be necessary to charge to the entrance of Mr. Roosevelt into the situation the loss of one anti-boss fight. It would be asking too much of frail human nature to expect Mr. Aldridge to be grateful, but it is not too much to credit him with feeling that Theodore Roosevelt has at last rendered him a real service in lieu of the man hitherto promised but never actually performed.

The tiger lily in his den
An angry noise did make.
The dandy lion roared aloud
Until the earth did quake.
The daisy, scared and trembling,
Ne'er daring to look up,

Lina and Some Others

A Frivolous Consideration of the Difference in Motive which Separates the Modern Beauty from the Incomparable Love-Queens of the Old-fashioned Past

By Edward F. O'Day

We have all read how it was done. They were alone together and no doubt the air was heavy with Lina's favorite perfume and humid with Bob's fevered suspirations. Probably Lina wore one of those comfy garments in which she likes to be photographed, a garment so scanty that we might suspect her of an economical turn if we did not know better. Bob wore that foolish grin which appears in all his pictures and which is sufficient explanation of everything that followed—one of those grins that irresistibly suggest the saw about a fool and his money. I suppose they had had a sultry session and that Bob was a good deal fagged. Certainly he was off his guard; his thoughts were on anything but prenuptial contracts. At any rate he was hardly Bob the sheriff or Bob the business man—probably he was just Bob with the artistic temperament—when Lina arose and moved with a slow rhythmic movement to the table. With one hand she picked up the agreement in English and with the other she picked up the agreement in French and holding them at arm's-length before her she moved with that same rhythmic movement toward Bob. Bob watched her coming and probably saw red. And then it was all over but the signing. He felt her velvety arms closing about his neck, he felt her moist mouth burning his face with its caress and he heard her voice breathing that almost inaudible yet perfectly business-like protestation, "Bob, how I love you!" And as Bob said afterwards with engaging candor, "My God! I'd have signed away my life." Which might have sounded heroic had not Lina said afterwards with equally engaging candor, "Of course, I never loved him." That alters the aspect of the whole affair and makes Bob look just a little bit more ridiculous than he usually looks in his pictures.

But let us waste no words on Bob. He is a negligible quantity. There is a Bob born every minute. Lina on the other hand is a rare bird, a veritable ornithological curiosity. The famous jackdaw of Rheims was not in Lina's class. Given an equal opportunity she would have flown away, not with the archbishop's ring but with the cathedral! And all the anathemas in the ritual wouldn't have coaxed it away from her. Her bump of acquisitiveness is wonderfully developed and poor Bob mistook it for the bump of amativeness!

Let us do Lina justice however. She is that interesting thing, a type. Some day she will be referred to as an archetype, a prototype. She is the type of feminine loveliness for which the twentieth century will probably be distinguished above all other centuries; the type of loveliness that carries a vanity box in one hand and a bank book in the other. If she is ever immortalized in marble as some of her predecessors were immortalized by Appelles and Praxitiles she will be seen bearing the horn of plenty but the horn will be inverted lest some of its plenty escape. At her girdle, if she wears a girdle, will hang the key to a safe deposit box and if the sculptor is a humorist, as some of our San Francisco sculptors are, he will carve at the base of the statue a whiskered Dolgorouki grinning at a whimpering Bob Chanler.

But whether or not she is ever carved in stone, Lina is destined to immortal notoriety. In the temple of Venus she will be enshrined as one of the high priestesses with Rhodope and Lais, with Cleopatra and Poppaea, with Fredegunda and Rosamonde and Ninon de l'Enclos. Of course she is essentially the modern woman, the emancipated feminine. She bears the same relation to these antique beauties that Mrs. Belmont does to La Pucelle or Carrie Nation to the Queen of the Amazons. Let us indicate the difference succinctly. Glorious John Dryden wrote a play about Cleopatra and called it "All for Love or, the World Well Lost." When Wilson Mizner or some other moral dramatist puts Lina into a play it will be called "All Your Money or Nothing Doing."

When Lina twined her velvety arms about Bob's neck and kissed his foolish babbling lips she was doing what many other beauties had done before her; but she was doing it in crude twentieth century fashion—and the motive was different. There is no getting away from the agreement in English and the agreement in French. They spoil the picture. It could hardly have been worse if she had summoned the notary and set him signing, sealing and blotting in the midst of her hothouse embracements.

Other times, other morals—and other ways of being immoral. That, for instance, was a famous occasion when Phryne, incomparable priestess of the Paphian rite, exerted the full blandishment of her beauty. It was in open court and a judicial array of hoary-headed Chanlers were trying her on a capital charge. She had no defense but her beauty; yet when her lawyer undraped her before her judges her naked charms won the case hands down. We order those things better in New York. The modern Phryne is not fighting for her life but for $100,000 a year.

While Phryne was no better than she should be, Esther and Judith, as we all know, were very respectable women; yet they were great beauties and to both came the crisis when it was necessary to exert the full power of their pulchritude. Esther, it will be remembered, appeared before her king glittering in royal robes, with a rosy color in her face and with gracious and bright eyes. We are told that she leaned on her hand-maidens, affecting a delicateness of gait, just as Lina affected a rhythmic motion. But the unbelievable beauty of Esther was exerted upon Assuerus to save the seed of Israel from destruction. Old-fashioned Esther never thought of handing him an agreement in Persian and an agreement in Hebrew calling for $100,000 a year. We all remember how Judith, the beautiful widow of Bethulia, washed her body, anointed herself with the best ointment, plaited the hair of her head, put a bonnet on her head, clothed herself in the garments of her gladness, put sandals on her feet and took her bracelets and lilies and earlets and rings and stood before Holofernes and we know how Holofernes was smitten with the desire of her and got himself gloriously drunk with wine just as Bob Chanler got himself drunk with love. What an opportunity was that for Judith if Judith had had a twentieth century training. But she only took Holofernes' head.

Why multiply instances out of the old-fashioned past? Think of the opportunity Salome missed after that dance which intoxicated Herod. A twentieth-century Salome would have proffered a different request. "Oh king, grant that I may repeat my dance before the people and give me the gate receipts on a charger!" And to what a deal of trouble Salammbo went merely to recover the sacred veil of the goddess!

As I said before, the eternal feminine is playing the same tricks today as yesterday, but the motive is different. With Phryne it was life, with Esther and Judith it was country, with Salome it was revenge, with Salammbo it was religion and with Lina it was $100,000 a year.

You seem a thing that hinges hold,
 A love-machine
 With clockwork joints of supple gold,
 No more, Faustine.

The Chorus Girl

By Anton Chekhov (From the Russian)

Once, when she was younger, prettier and had a better voice, her admirer, Nikolai Petrovich Kolpakov, was sitting in the entrance of her summer cottage. It was unbearably hot and stifling. Kolpakov had just dined and had drunk a full bottle of cheap port; he was out of sorts and not very well, they were both suffering from ennui and were waiting until it should become a little cooler, so that they could go for a walk.

Suddenly and unexpectedly the bell rang. Kolpakov, who was in his shirt-sleeves and slippers, sprang from his seat and looked questioning at Pasha.

"Probably the letter-carrier—or maybe one of the girls," she said.

Kolpakov would not feel embarrassed in the presence either of the letter-carrier or of Pasha's friend; but, to guard against a possible emergency, he caught up his clothes and boots in one hand and went into the next room, while Pasha ran to open the door.

To Pasha's great surprise she found there an unknown, young and beautiful woman, dressed with exquisite taste and evidently a lady.

The stranger was very pale and breathed hard, as if she had just climbed a very long flight of stairs.

"What can I do for you?" Pasha asked.

The lady did not reply at once. She made a step forward, slowly looked around the room and sat down in a way that clearly showed she was tired out. Then she moved her pale lips in an effort to say something.

"Is my husband here, at your house?" she at last asked, lifting to Pasha a pair of large eyes with lids red from weeping.

"What husband?" Pasha whispered.

"My husband—Nikolai Petrovich Kolpakov."

"No, no, madame—I—I do not know any husband."

A moment passed in silence. Several times the stranger touched her pale lips with her handkerchief and held her breath, as if to repress an inner shivering. Pasha stood riveted before her and looked at her in perplexity.

"So you say he is not here?" asked the lady, with a stronger voice and smiling with a strange kind of smile.

"I—I do not know whom you are asking about."

"You are a nasty, odious, vile creature," the stranger began, looking at Pasha with hatred and disgust. "Yes, you are abominable, and I am glad, very glad, that I at last have the opportunity to tell you so!"

Pasha felt that she was making an impression of something nauseatingly ugly on this lady, all in black, with her thin, white fingers.

"Where is my husband?" continued the lady. "But, after all, what does it matter if he is here or not? But I must tell you that the defalcation has been discovered and they have begun a search for Nikolai Petrovich—he will be arrested. See what you have done!"

The lady rose to her feet and walked about the room in great excitement.

"Today he will be found and arrested," she went on, with a sob, and the sound showed how grieved and outraged she was. "I know who brought him to this horror! You odious, low, miserable, lewd, mercenary creature!" The lady's lips curled and her nose wrinkled in disgust. "I am helpless—listen to me, you low woman!—I am helpless, you are stronger than I; but there is One who will defend me and my children! God sees everything; He is just! He will call you to account for every one of my tears, for all my sleepless nights! There will come a time when you will remember my words!"

Again there was silence. The lady walked to and fro wringing her hands, and Pasha stood and stared at her as stupidly as before, not comprehending what it all meant and awaiting something terrible at her hands.

"I do not know anything, lady," she said at last, and suddenly burst into tears.

"You lie!" cried the lady, her eyes flashing angrily. "I know all. I know he has spent every day of the last month at your house!"

"Well, what of that? I receive many guests at my house, but I do not compel anybody to come. They come of their own accord."

"I tell you that his defalcation has been discovered! He has spent other people's money! For such as you, for you he has committed a crime! Listen to me!" the lady cried, stopping determinedly before Pasha. "You cannot have any principles; you live only to bring misfortune—that is your aim; but I cannot think that you have fallen so low that you have lost every vestige of human feeling! He has a wife, children—if he should be found guilty and sent to Siberia I and his children will die of hunger. Do you understand what it means? But there is a way to save him and all of us from poverty and disgrace. If I should bring them today the nine hundred rubles he has embezzled they would leave him alone. Only nine hundred rubles!"

"What nine hundred rubles?" Pasha asked in a low voice. "I—I do not understand—I have not taken—"

"I do not ask you for the nine hundred rubles. You have no money, and I do not want what belongs to you. I ask you for something else. Men generally give costly presents to such as you. Return me only those trinkets that were given you by my husband!"

"Madame, your husband has never given me any trinkets!" screamed Pasha, who was at last beginning to understand.

"Then where is the money? He has squandered all I had and taken that of others. Where has it all gone to? Listen to me, I beg of you—I was excited and said many unpleasant things, but I beg your pardon. You must hate me, I know; but if you are capable of feeling pity you will understand my situation. I implore you to return the things to me!"

"M-m-m—" said Pasha, shrugging her shoulders. "I would gladly do so, but may God punish me if I have taken anything from him. Upon my conscience! But let us see," and the chorus girl suddenly became confused. "Some time ago he did bring me two trinkets—if you care to have them I will return them to you."

Pasha pulled out a toilet-table drawer and took out a blown-gold bracelet and a thin gold ring set with a cheap ruby.

"Please take them!" she said, handing them to her visitor.

"What is this you are giving me?" she asked. "I have not come here for charity. I have come for what does not belong to you—for what you, taking advantage of your position, have forced out of my husband—the weak, unfortunate man! On Thursday, when I saw you with him in the harbor you wore costly brooches and bracelets, so there's no occasion to play the innocent with me! I ask you for the last time: will you or will you not give me the things?"

"Lord, how funny you are!" said Pasha, beginning, in her turn, to feel offended. "I assure you that I have not received from your Nikolai Petrovich anything other than this bracelet and little ring. He used to bring me only sweet tarts."

"Sweet tarts!" The stranger smiled bitterly. "At home the children have nothing to eat, and here we eat sweet tarts! Then you refuse finally to return the trinkets?"

There was no reply. The lady pressed her handkerchief to her face and burst into tears.

"I implore you!" she cried through her sobs. "You were the ruin and undoing of my husband, I implore you to save him. You have no pity for him, but the children, the children—what have they done that this misfortune should fall upon them?"

Pasha pictured to herself the little children standing in the street and crying with hunger, and began crying herself.

"What can I do, madame?" she said. "You say that I am a wretch and that I have ruined Nikolai Petrovich, and yet I swear to you, as if I were standing before our Lord God Himself, that I have not in any way benefited by your husband's visits. In all our chorus there is only Moti who has a rich admirer."

"I ask you for the things! It is the thing I want of you! I weep, lower myself—if you want I will fall on my knees to you!"

Pasha cried out in sudden fear and wrung her hands. She felt that this pale lady, who spoke in the high, refined language in which people generally express themselves on the stage, would make her threat good and really fall on her knees before her. She would do that out of pride and nobleness, knowing that it would elevate herself and degrade her, the chorus girl.

"Well, I will give you the things," Pasha began to bustle about, wiping her eyes. "You can have them. But they are not from your Nikolai Petrovich. I got them from my other guests. But, as you please!"

She pulled out the top drawer of the bureau and took from it a brooch set with diamonds, a string of coral, several rings and a bracelet and handed them all to the lady.

"Take them if you want to, but I tell you again, I had no benefit whatsoever from your husband. Take them, and get rich on it!" continued Pasha, who was deeply offended at the lady's threat to fall on her knees to her. "And if you are a noble, legal wife to him, you had better keep him in hand near yourself, that's all! I did not call him—he came himself."

The lady looked at the jewelry through her tears. "These will not suffice," she said. "There is hardly five hundred rubles' worth here."

Pasha impetuously threw out of the bureau a gold watch, a cigar-case and a pair of cuff buttons, and cried, with a fling of her hands:

"And now I have nothing more left! You may even search me!"

The visitor sighed and with trembling hands wrapped the trinkets in a handkerchief, and without saying a word, without even the slightest bow, she left the room.

The door of the next room opened and Kolpakov appeared. He was very pale, his head shook nervously, as if he had just swallowed something bitter, and tears were in his eyes.

"What kind of things have you given me?" Pasha fell upon him. "When, I ask you?"

"Things—nonsense, who speaks of things!" said Kolpakov, shaking his head. "My God! She cried before you, lowered herself—"

"I ask you: what things have you given me?" screamed Pasha.

"Good Lord! She, noble, proud, pure, she wanted to go down on her knees before—before this wench! And I brought her to this! I allowed it!"

He caught his head in his two hands and groaned.

"No, I will never forgive you this! Never! Get out of my sight, you vile creature!" he shouted, backing away from Pasha with disgust.

"She wanted to go down on her knees, and to whom? To you! Oh, my God!"

He dressed himself quickly, avoiding contact with Pasha, and turned toward the door and went out.

Pasha lay down and began to cry bitterly. She was already regretting the trinkets she had so thoughtlessly given away, but she felt, too, deeply offended. She remembered how a merchant, about three years before, had given her a beating without any provocation, and cried still more bitterly.

Let Him Talk

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Don't worry about the Constitution. Let Teddy yawp and yawp and fume and fret. The more he talks the less harmful he becomes. Great talkers are like leaky pots; everything runs out of them and they are soon empty and the bottom of them becomes visible. It's the wagging tongue that shakes out the master's undoing. When a man speaks foolishly, suffer him gladly. He that cannot refrain from much speaking is like a city without walls. Long after Teddy has said his last word the Constitution will be in good working order. Long after the present so-called problems have been forgotten wise men will be applying the principles of the Constitution in the solving of new ones. Time is a greater innovator than Teddy, but Time has dealt gently with our Constitution. It has gone without material alteration for more than a century and the greatest of innovators has been actively at work. Gladstone deemed the American Constitution the greatest of all original productions in its line. No matter what Teddy may think the American people are not yet such dampfools as to let him manhandle it.

The Mayor and His Critics

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Some weeks ago certain daily papers were intimating that owing to Mayor McCarthy's affiliations he would do nothing toward improving the police department. They insinuated that the Chief of Police had a pull, and that it would be very embarrassing to the Mayor to discipline some of his subordinates. In view of what has recently occurred it seems to me that those newspaper innuendos were groundless. Mayor McCarthy has shaken up the police department, and he has ordered that no favors be shown to law-breakers. Why not give him the credit due?

The Broderick-Terry Duel

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I read in this morning's Examiner an announcement of the death of Samuel Huston Brooks, one of the pioneers of this city. In the article the statement was made that Brooks was the last surviving eye-witness of the Broderick-Terry duel. This is a mistake, as nobody should know better than yourself, for it is not very long since you published some very interesting details of the famous meeting supplied by an eye-witness who is still living. I refer to my old friend Pressley C. Hyman, once a well known figure in the life of this city but now living in Nevada. I call attention to this fact simply because the Broderick-

Cost of Living May Go Down

The cost of living should be cut considerably by the tremendous run of live stock and grain which is now going to the middle-western markets and which is the largest in the history of the Missouri River cities. In one day last week more than 50,000 sheep reached the Omaha stock yards. Fifteen thousand head of cattle were received and the receipt of hogs was large in proportion. The increase in the amount of grain going to market is twenty per cent and provision men figure that the marketing of so much live stock will lower the prices of fresh meat as well as reduce the price of grain because of the lessening demand.

Airships for India

A German syndicate which markets aeroplanes, dirigibles and balloons recently sent an agent to India and Japan to look over the situation and his journey has borne interesting fruit. The agent reports that the native rulers of India who are enormously wealthy and who keep abreast of the times, particularly in matters of sport and pleasure, are very enthusiastic about aviation and anxious to learn the manipulation of aircrafts. The Maharajah of Jaipur is especially eager to buy an aeroplane. The Japanese too are interested in aviation but there is a financial stringency there and few can afford just now to invest in flying machines.

Trinity Tenements Gone

During the past eighteen months Trinity Corporation of New York, the millionaire company that handles the business affairs of Trinity Church, has done more toward the modernization of its vast real estate holdings than it had done in more than two hundred years of its existence. The policy of making improvements was adopted after a great deal of public censure and was begun in January of 1909. Since then Trinity has caused to be erected eight large mercantile buildings at a cost of more than $1,500,000. These improvements have wiped out more than 150 front and rear tenements. At the present time Trinity is almost free of these objectionable holdings.

The British Labor Party's Plight

A crisis in the affairs of the Labor party of Great Britain has been precipitated by the verdict of the law courts in the celebrated "Osborne Case." The subject of dispute in this case which ran for many years was the objection of a railway porter to being compelled to contribute twopence a year to his trade union for the purpose of maintaining a representative in Parliament as a member of the Labor party. The contention of this porter was that the support of a political party and especially the payment of election expenses and salaries to members of Parliament were outside the objects for which the assessment of workmen was authorized in the Trades Unions Act. The House of Lords has upheld this contention and injunctions have been issued against all the trades unions preventing them from levying these assessments. The result is that the Labor party is face to face with destitution. It can neither pay its members their salaries nor face another general election.

For Stricter Bank Examination

Comptroller of the Currency Murray announces that he will soon set out on a six-month tour of the country in the course of which he will visit every bank examiner's district in the country and find out at first hand whether the examiners are doing their duty. In a memorandum announcing this project Mr. Murray declares that practically every bank failure in recent years could have been averted if the examiners had done their duty. To the complaint that the requirement that bank examiners shall meet with the directorate of each bank twice a year and go over the result of the bank examination is a hardship on both Mr. Murray laconically replies that the directors and examiners who complain are not doing their duty in any sense of the word. It is expected that there will be a rattling of bones in the national bank examiners' service before Mr. Murray gets through.

More Men for the Army

Major-General Leonard Wood, chief of staff, announced after his recent conference with President Taft that the army would be recruited to the authorized minimum strength of 87,000 men. At present, General Wood said, the strength of the standing army is only 82,000 officers and men. The reinforcements, therefore, will have to be enlisted. Work on this will start at once in order that the armed force of the country should reach its minimum by next year. The reduction in the army's strength to the present figure was the result of short appropriations. Five thousand men have been allowed to leave the service without the enlistment of other men to fill their places. While with the President General Wood also discussed the army estimates for the coming year. He said that the total estimates, including the rivers and harbors work, would be several million dollars less than the estimates for last year. One feature of the estimates calls for the construction of permanent buildings in the Philippines for the use of troops, rather than temporary structures, such as have been the rule in the past.

Fewer Seek to Smuggle

As a result of the customs reforms inaugurated by Collector Loeb of the port of New York three thousand cabin passengers arriving in one day can be handled with ease and without any of the disagreeable incidents so frequent in the days of tangled red tape. The new system has been tried out effectively during the recent rush of returning travelers from Europe and is found to work splendidly. The new declarations show careful preparation and in view of the daily seizures which are flashed to the incoming steamers by wireless few are willing to take chances. Out of three thousand passengers whose luggage was examined one day recently there were not a dozen complaints and these were adjudicated on the piers. In many cases where it was seen by the passengers that the examination was to be thorough permission was asked to amend declarations as some foreign purchases had been "forgotten."

Interior Press Opposes Bond Issue

The proposed Constitutional amendment to enable the State to issue bonds for the World's Fair is not receiving the unanimous support of the editors of California. It appears that we have many converts to make at home as well as abroad. This is a matter that is not being discussed by the local press, but no good is to be accomplished by suppression of the news. It is advisable for us to know the truth, especially in this instance since we are doing nothing toward abating the inspiration of the hostility of the interior press. The truth is that our chickens are coming home to roost. As the Sacramento Union observes, "San Francisco is a graphic illustration of the truth of the old proverb about giving a dog a bad name." San Francisco has been given a very bad name by its own newspapers, by the newspapers that are now suppressing the news. These newspapers are still giving it a bad name. They are still encouraging those irrepressible lovers of newspaperery who pose as civic patriots, as uncompromising moralists, and who devote themselves with quixotic enthusiasm to the business of transforming a great metropolis into a sinless Eden. And hence many of the interior editors believing that San Francisco is what it has been represented to be by the San Francisco press—the most abandoned city on the globe, governed by grafters eager to get their hands on the money of stupid taxpayers—are protesting vigorously against the bond issue on the ground that the money may fall into the hands of thieves. "It is to be frankly confessed," says the San Bernardino Sun, "that there is a great deal of opposition to the Panama exposition bonds proposed." But this journal is not among the opponents. It endorses all the Union says in favor of a bond issue and adds, "The question for us in Southern California to decide is whether the exposition held there (San Francisco) will be worth the price of the bond issue—not to San Francisco but to the State. The Sun believes that the State at large will permanently benefit more than San Francisco."

One for the Recording Angel

When Rose Stahl first played "The Chorus Lady" in San Francisco she assisted at the breaking of ground for the Columbia Theater and after the ceremony Henry T. Scott drove her to the St. Francis Hotel in a dump cart. It was a very merry occasion and the fun of it has lingered in the mind of the magnate. So when Miss Stahl returned to the city three weeks ago Scott had her rooms at the hotel banked with flowers. Scott, Manager James Woods of the St. Francis and several others were on hand to note the impression which the floral offering would make on the actress. They gathered about her as the bell-boy threw open the door of her apartments and switched on the lights. Miss Stahl drew back in great surprise. And this is what she said: "Well, I'll be ——! Is this a bridal chamber or an undertaking parlor?"

Her Great Success

There was something very unusual about Miss Stahl's recent engagement. It was this—on the night of her last appearance she was called out for a speech after the fall of the last curtain. It is not unusual for a popular star in a good play to receive an ovation which calls for a speech. That generally happens at the end of the third act on the first night of the star's appearance. It hardly ever happens at the end of the play. In fact it is very rarely that a fashionable audience applauds at the end of a play. It is thinking of hats and wraps and supper and cannot get away from the theater too quickly. If it is an infrequent thing for an audience to applaud at the end of the play on the first night, judge how seldom this must happen on the last night! Yet that was what happened to Rose Stahl. At Sunday's evening performance she was given a real ovation when the curtain fell for the last time on the happenings in the O'Brien family. The audience remained in its seats and applauded and applauded again till Miss Stahl consented to make a little speech. It was brief but to the point. Miss Stahl was evidently very happy. She ought to be, for her season has been an artistic and financial success.

The Return of Frances Starr

In the return of Frances Starr to this city there is a deeper interest for theatergoers than usually attaches to actresses who leave us in obscurity and return in the blaze of stardom. All the old patrons of the Alcazar remember Fannie Starr, one of the prettiest and cleverest ingenues who ever appeared in the stock theater. But the circumstances surrounding Fannie Starr's departure were sensational in the extreme and that lends unusual interest to her reappearance. It will be remembered that James Durkin, the leading man of the Alcazar, became infatuated with Miss Starr, so infatuated that for awhile he forgot that he was married. Miss Starr was young and inexperienced and became somewhat enamored of the handsome leading man. The passion was sufficient on both sides to cause an elopement which was the nine days' wonder of the Rialto. The affair ended as all such affairs should—it simply died of inanition. Therein was Frances Starr's good fortune for James Durkin has never manifested more than mediocre ability as an actor and is now playing somewhere in "the provinces." When Frances Starr separated from him she went to New York and entered on the career which has led her to stardom.

The Bowes' Are Inseparable

From the newspapermen who have had occasion to interview Margaret Illington I learn that Edward J. Bowes and his wife are well nigh inseparable. To interview the actress means also to interview the husband-manager, a situation which the newspapermen have accepted gracefully although it is one of the canons of interviewing that outside influences should be eliminated as far as possible. The situation is shown vividly by Ralph Renaud, the dramatic critic of the Chronicle who wrote last Sunday: "I sought out Miss Illington. Naturally, I found Mr. Bowes, too, for he had explained to me the night before that, except while she was actually on the stage, it was scarcely possible to locate one without encountering the other." Renaud very gallantly comments on this condition: "Judging from the vision of united felicity that was unfolded before my enraptured eyes in the next two hours, it was scarcely a question of separate entities, anyway." That this inseparability does not by any means pall upon Mrs. Bowes may be judged from what she said later on: "The only thing I was afraid of in coming to San Francisco was that my husband had so many friends they might take him away from me. But since I've gone back on the stage I really see more of him than I did in Tacoma, where he went down to business every day. You see, he can't get away from me now." To which Bowes replied: "Well, I certainly don't struggle very hard."

Their Connubial Felicity

From Mr. Renaud's colorful page it is easy to imagine the loveglow that surrounds the emotional actress and her husband. In fact there is apparently no attempt on the part of either to hide the depth of their connubial felicity from the public. "Our tastes are the same," explained Mrs. Bowes, "and we both love the same things, don't we, dear one? We find no happiness away from each other. Our oneness is perfectly divine." When the enthusiastic Bowes turned dramatic critic for the moment and favored Mr. Renaud with his analysis of his wife's gifts she playfully protested. "'Loved one! Loved one!' expostulated Miss Illington, running over and throwing her arms about his neck." And here is another of their sugary passages-at-arms: "What I like to hear from a critic," Miss Illington remarked, "is what he truly thinks. When I'm taking my bath or doing up my hair I can tell myself all the sweet things I want." "Not quite all, dear," amended Bowes. "You know I have charge of that department."

They Want to Play Juliet

It is not surprising to learn that both Frances Starr and Margaret Illington are eager to interpret the part of Juliet. All actresses yearn to elevate the stage with their conception of this most difficult of Shakespearian roles, just as all actors cherish the ambition of playing Hamlet. One of the great Shakespearian critics, in accounting for the dearth of great Juliets, has explained that by the time a woman has acquired the maturity of mind and the plenitude of experience to interpret the part correctly she has reached an age when the failure of her physical charms unfits her for the presentation. But neither Miss Starr nor Miss Illington seems to worry about this difficulty. Miss Illington declares that she wants to play Juliet while she is still in her twenties. This statement, by the way, is interesting because it indicates that Miss Illington is still hardly more than a slip of a girl in years. Miss Starr does not say whether she wishes to play the part in her twenties or thirties; no doubt she would play it tomorrow if Belasco would let her. There is no gainsaying that both actresses during their rather brief careers have had more emotional experience off the stage than usually falls to the lot of wouldbe Juliets.

The Poisoners of Public Opinion

From an editorial writer who writes for hire at the dictation of any managing editor who will give him employment I learn that a wandering judge campaigning for a job has been advising the passage of a law making it a crime for any newspaper to attempt for gain to corrupt public opinion. What great solicitude there is these days for public opinion, especially on the part of job-chasers, most of whom take money under false pretenses every time they get on the people's pay-roll! It is of course unfortunate that public opinion should ever be poisoned by sordid and conscienceless editors, but we should not lose sight of the fact that there are poisoners of the bema as well as of the tripod. We cannot safeguard public opinion by special legislation. It would be unjust to discriminate against the bawds of journalism and give immunity to unscrupulous jawsmiths. Nor should we ignore the fact that when public opinion is poisoned the motive is of not the slightest consequence. What difference does it make whether public opinion be poisoned by an editor for gain or by a judge for the salary attached to a job which he knows he is unfit to fill? Again, what difference does it make whether public opinion be poisoned by an editor for gain or by an editor whose compensation is the gratification that comes from indulging the mean passions peculiar to a shallow and undisciplined mind. The vindictive editor or the frenzied, unscrupulous partisan of the tripod does just as much damage in this world as the editor who prostitutes his conscience for hire or as the muckraking editorial writer who wanders from journal to journal adopting as his own the policy of the publisher that pays him his salary, blackening the characters of men who befriended him and not even drawing the line at the last publisher that gave him his bread.

Editors and Their Puppets

This solicitude for public opinion affected by a wandering judge who sneaked into his profession through a back door and now arrogates to himself the right of always passing judgment on his own conduct, reminds me of a recent exclamation that I heard—"O Humbug! What farces are played in thy name." Now I have not the slightest solicitude for public opinion. But I am impatient of itinerant job-chasers, who go about with their eyes raised to heaven vindicating their goodness by affecting ideals wholly incompatible with themselves. Most of these pharisaical followers of the pie-wagon are under obligations to poisoners of public opinion for every meal they eat. For it is the poisoning of opinion that renders them tolerable to a systematically deluded public. Keep your eye on the average successful job-chaser, and when you find that he is the door-mat of some editor it will be safe for you to view him with suspicion. Editors are hard task-masters. They love to make their puppets dance. The chief vice for which they are censured is that of exposing the shortcomings of personal character, but the truth is their worst crime is that of concealing the defects of men in public life for the purpose of facilitating illusions and making heroes of knaves and mediocrities. For it is only a knave or mediocrity who will permit himself to be guided in public office by the whims of an editor with selfish interests to promote. We often wonder at the frequency with which our public idols are toppled from their pedestals. The reason is that impostors fashioned by the press abound among them. The newspaper idol usually has feet of clay, and they are discovered in time. The public servant who is always eager to do the bidding of editors is not likely to have much self-respect, and it is natural that such a man should not wear well. So, we see, there are many motives for the poisoning of public opinion, and that how to render its diet wholesome is a question the solution of which calls for considerable study and reflection.

A Martyr's Sad Story

Mrs. Elizabeth Gerberding of the Ladies League of Justice is now telling the readers of The Delineator all the wonderful things she did when shoulder to shoulder with Barclay Henley and Professor Boke she was trying to redeem this incorrigible community. The chief purpose of Mrs. Gerberding's contribution to The Delineator, I judge, is to present herself in the role of a martyr to the cause of civic righteousness. She tells us that as a result of her beneficent activities she was "cut" and snubbed by women of wealth and social position, and that her vanity was wounded. She gives many specific instances of the rebuffs that she suffered, but she is singularly reticent with regard to names. Mrs. Gerberding enlists my profoundest sympathy not so much on account of the tribulations she endured as on account of the blind bigotry of her partisanship. She has accepted as though it were holy writ everything that was told her by the illustrious regenerators who used her for their sinister purpose. She believes to this day that the Supreme Court reversed the Schmitz case because the indictment failed to set forth that Schmitz was mayor of the city. This absurd partisan balderdash is incorporated in her magazine article. Mrs. Gerberding really believes that Haas was hired to shoot Heney, and that Haas was killed in the County Jail "after he had made damaging admissions to Mr. Burns." Mrs. Gerberding believes also that the graft prosecution failed altogether because of the power of wealth that opposed it. Not the slightest conception has she of the depths of infamy sounded by the scoundrels who enjoy her esteem, the patriots who revolted public sentiment by their indecencies and enormities. Mrs. Gerberding has been cruelly deceived and misled. She is a very worthy woman, I am told, possessed of intellectual qualities above the average, and it is too bad that she should have been persuaded to repose confidence in such unprincipled rogues as Francis J. Heney, William J. Burns and their shameless masters. It is evident from her article that she has believed everything that has been told her by men who would not believe one another under oath.

"Yes, sir," said Jones, "Brown is a man who keeps his word; but then he has to."

"How is that?" asked Robinson.

"Because no one will take it."

The Stainless Heart in Nevada

According to the latest advices from Nevada the Hon. H. V. Morehouse has become the President of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League of that State. As a progressive Republican Mr. Morehouse is entitled to rank with some of the leaders of our own darling Lincoln-Roosevelt League who have a past not less savory than that of the illustrious statesman of the stainless heart. There is not a more enthusiastic reformer in all Nevada than the ex-Senator from California who returned to his constituents from a session of the legislature with a roll of bills big enough to choke a bulldog. His hatred of the machine is fully as

Steinway Pianola Piano at Kohler & Chase

¶ The Steinway Pianola Piano is a combination of the Steinway Upright and the Pianola. The makers of the Steinway Piano looked far and wide for the best player in the world to be linked with the Steinway Piano—it is the Pianola that has been chosen. You should follow this distinguished example when you come to buy a player-piano. Be sure that you get the genuine Pianola. Do not be satisfied with any weak substitute. Please remember that Pianola Piano is a name for a certain kind of player-piano and is not a name for all player-pianos. Remember that there are 300 features in the Pianola Piano, which are not to be found in any other player-piano.

¶ In addition to the Steinway, you will find the genuine Pianola only in the Weber Pianola Piano, the Steck Pianola Piano, the Stuyvesant Pianola Piano and the Wheelock Pianola Piano. This entire line can be found only at Kohler & Chase.

The Busy Gumshoe Man

Immigration Commissioner Hart North is having the same experience that Postmaster Fisk had about a year ago. It will be remembered that Fisk was made very uneasy by the machinations of a little group of pestiferous politicians belonging to the cabal of which James Rudolph Garfield is the head and inspiration. The leader of the group on this coast is one of Roosevelt's pets, a typical Roosevelt reformer, heartily in sympathy with every scheme to discredit the Taft administration, and partial to the methods of the distinguished moralists who bribed Secretary Ballinger's stenographer to betray the confidence of his chief. Fisk was spied upon by a clerk in the postoffice who made reports to the bureaucrats at Washington possessing about as much truth as those which Glavis sent on concerning Ballinger. Fisk was made the subject of three investigations and each time it was reported that the charges against him were groundless. As a result the spy was removed from his office. Now the same methods are being practiced in North's case. One of his subordinates has been long engaged in gumshoe work, and everything that North has done, which, to a person resolved to procure evidence of irregularity might be construed in a way to warrant suspicion of wrongdoing has been reported to Washington.

Because He Merely Lied

W. C. Edgar, editor of the Northwestern Miller of Minneapolis, made some interesting observations the other day in New York while discussing the Conservation Congress recently held at St. Paul. He said:

"Pinchot, in his partisan desire to get revenge, more than from a desire to advance the cause of conservation, dominated the congress and had his friends elected to the offices. When he got through there was not enough conservation left to pay the freight home. Then that chap Heney of California, who talked on the conservation of lands, said that James J. Hill had made a tremendous lot of money out of land grants for building his roads through them, when as a matter of fact Hill never got a dollar from such a source. So this rather discredited Heney with us. We rural folk out there got to look upon the conservation congress much in the light of a prize fight that had been arranged for our benefit. It provided an amusing illustration of the tactics of the younger class of politicians who are coming to the front and does not reflect credit upon this school. The actually big men who attended the congress took to the woods when they found the way things were being conducted. If anything more than the apotheosis of Pinchot was accomplished we plain folk who live near the woods and the streams that they talk about conserving couldn't see it at all."

From this it would seem that in the neighborhood of St. Paul and Minneapolis a man doesn't have to go far to discredit himself. Heney had to do a lot of loose talking hereabouts before the people got wise. He ran amuck here more than two years, during which time he talked incessantly except during the intervals in which he was busy making affidavits, and never for a moment did he take the pains to tell the truth or even to give verisimilitude to his preposterous mouthings. Yet he held public confidence until the dogs in the street grew intolerant and snarled at him as he passed.

He Left a Crook of Gold

I noted in the death column a few days ago the death of Mrs. Karoline Schmitz, the widow of Dr. J. P. Schmitz and this reminded me of a story which has never been published. Dr. Schmitz was admitted to the practice of medicine rather late in life and was very successful in his chosen profession. He accumulated quite a fortune and died a few years ago. When he was on his deathbed he confided to his wife that he had hidden in the cellar of the home a large crock full of gold pieces and he gave her directions for unearthing it. Mrs. Schmitz was a very religious woman, a member among other things of the Third Order of St. Francis and when she decided that it would be expedient to have a witness to the unearthing of the crock of gold she went to the Franciscan monastery in Golden Gate avenue and obtained from the superior permission for a monk to accompany her. Then she repaired to the cellar and sure enough found the crock which contained a good many thousands of dollars. Mrs. Schmitz deposited the money in a savings bank and later took her eight children there and had the money divided equally among them.

Writing Up Our Celebrities

San Francisco celebrities are coming in for a great deal of advertisement in the popular magazines. In one of the magazines a series of articles dealing with our railroad pioneers has brought several San Franciscans still living into the limelight and it is announced that in the forthcoming issue of another magazine there will be an exhaustive study of the career and character of Gavin McNab, the most astute of our politicians. This study is to come from the pen of the indefatigable Richard Barry, reporter and war correspondent. Which reminds me of a story. At the time of the fire Richard Barry was on the staff of the Bulletin. So was Miss Corinne Barry who achieved a great deal of disagreeable publicity by her marriage to and divorce from a gilded youth named Bullock while both were students at the University of California. A few days after the fire Richard Barry interviewed Gavin McNab and his article in the Bulletin began with these words: "At midnight I sat alone with Gavin McNab in his apartments." And the "make-up man" put over this statement the legend "by Corinne Barry." The mistake of course was corrected in the second edition.

The Career of Colonel Trumbo

In still another magazine Richard Barry has been writing of the political menace of the Mormon Church and the subject leads him to an interesting account of Colonel Isaac Trumbo's career. Trumbo is one of our most interesting colonels. Only Colonel Kowalsky is in the same class with him. Both have achieved mightily and with picturesque effect and both possess that highest form of the humorous sense which assimilates banter and comes back for more. Barry gives certain details of Colonel Trumbo's Salt Lake career which are probably new to the majority of my readers. He says the colonel first appeared in Salt Lake in the early nineties and that he was a personable, well dressed and liberal young man who told good stories and had "enough manner" to carry him into exclusive homes. He had no visible means of support, apparently no profession or business and as far as anybody knew, no property. Though not a Mormon he associated with the Saints and was dubbed on that account a "Jack-Mormon."

ORDERING SUPPLIES by TELEPHONE

THE retail merchant's telephone serves not only as a salesman, but also as a purchasing agent.

When a merchant finds that he is going to run out of a line of goods, he calls up the wholesaler or factory and not only orders a new stock, but comes to an agreement on the price and the time of delivery.

The unexpected needs of his customers can be met with the least possible delay.

If the merchant cannot find what he wants in town, the Long Distance Service of the Bell System brings him into immediate communication with other cities and other markets.

The Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co.

Every Bell Telephone is the Centre of the System

Barry goes on, to say that it was only when Colonel Trumbo settled in San Francisco that the source of his prosperity became known. "For it was Trumbo who was the first go-between in the deals which are said to have been made between the Mormon Church and the national Republican party. . . . The first deal was made over the admission of Utah to statehood. The price, in money, which the church is supposed to have paid for this was $100,000, turned over to Trumbo, and part of which, at least, reached the coffers of the national committee." Barry says further that if Mark Hanna had made his deal with Trumbo in time Utah would not have gone Democratic in 1896. All of which, if true, indicates that in Colonel Trumbo we have an adroit political manipulator retired from business.

A Bargain for Votes

A companion piece to the foregoing picture is another presented by Barry in which he shows us Theodore Roosevelt putting through a deal with the Mormons. He tells us that in the fall of 1904 when Republican leaders were panicky Roosevelt feared that the election might turn on a handful of electoral votes. In this moment of anxiety he sought one of the agents of the Mormon Church and negotiated for the Mormon vote in Utah, Wyoming and Idaho which is always cast as directed by the head of the church. The church agreed to deliver the electoral votes of those States in exchange for three things: (1) a cessation of the movement and agitation within the Republican party for an amendment to the federal constitution giving to Congress the power to legislate concerning polygamy and polygamous living; (2) a defense of Reed Smoot, apostle and representative of the Mormon hierarchy, as a senator of the United States, and a vote for his retention of his seat in the Senate; and (3) a disposition of federal patronage in Utah and surrounding States in obedience to the wish of the Mormon hierarchy expressed to the federal administration through Apostle Reed Smoot." Barry continues: "After Roosevelt was elected it was said, as emanating from him, that all he promised the Mormon leaders was that they should be 'freed from persecution.' He did not, however, inquire very closely into the actual conditions in the Mormon country, nor has he ever shown any disposition for such inquiry." Barry, it is plain, is qualified for membership in the Ananias Club.

Maud Berri's Divorce

Intimate friends of Maude Lillian Berri have known for some time that her heart was estranged from Frank Moulan, her absentee husband. They have realized that a reconciliation was well nigh impossible because the statuesque prima donna has intimated that she is sceptical of her husband's fidelity. Rightly or wrongly Miss Berri has harbored the suspicion that there was another woman imperilling her domestic happiness and whether or not she has banished this misgiving I do not know, though it seems unlikely in view of the coming divorce. Frank Moulan is Maude Berri's second husband. She was formerly Maude Lillian Berri Fisher and has a daughter named Berrita who used to live with her father's people in Oakland. Frank Moulan made his first big hit in New York with the Savage production of "The Sultan of Sulu" at Wallack's when his work placed him in the first rank of comic opera comedians. Maude Berri was a member of the company but resigned in a huff when she found that another singer had a larger dressing room, or for some such tremendous trifle. Frank dutifully followed his wife out of the company, joining the Anna Held forces, whereupon Savage secured an injunction and tied him up to Savage productions exclusively for three years.

Captain Duke's Book on Crime

All the literateurs of the police department are on edge with expectancy over the book on American criminology which Police Captain Duke is preparing for the press. It is too early to state when this contribution to scientific literature will be published. In fact I have not heard whether Captain Duke has yet come to terms with a publisher; but that the book is in an advanced stage of composition I have every reason to believe. Captain Duke has become a familiar figure in the libraries and book shops and some details of his literary methods have leaked out. I understand that his principal authorities for the philosophy of crime consist of the Arthurian trilogy of criminologists, Arthur Conan Doyle, Arthur Train and Arthur Stringer and that finding the local criminal field too circumscribed he has enlarged his vision to overlook all the great criminal cases of the country. This fact has led a jealous police captain to refer to the forthcoming book as "Duke's Mixture" and to hint that scissors and paste pot play an overshadowing part in its preparation, but such statements may be traced to that envious feeling with which the budding author has so frequently to deal. Naturally it will rest with "Literary Bob" Curtin to pass judgment on the book and as Bob has had more experience in the literary field than Captain Duke his criticism will be authoritative.

A San Rafael Alarm Bell

Out of San Rafael, or more specifically, out of the editorial column of our esteemed contemporary, the Marin County Tocsin, comes the lowdown explanation of why Maine went Democratic. As this is a question which all politicians are discussing let us hearken for a moment to the vibrant tintinnabulations of the editorial alarm bell that swings in the placid air of our beautiful suburb. Hist! "Does anyone remember the name of the dastardly murderer who after beating his wife's brains out sunk her battered body in a trunk in Lake Como, Italy, and made his escape to this country, where his father is a high official in the government at Washington? Don't you remember, it is only a few months ago, that the State department went to the defense of the confessed fiend and Italy's demand for his extradition was denied? Well, thanks to 'pull,' the brute is here yet and there is no danger of his ever answering for his crime. This case alone was enough to make a dozen Maines go Democratic or anything else that would create a change at the debauched capital of this nation." With due deference to the Tocsin and its political acumen I would venture the suggestion that it has stated only part of the case. Being somewhat au courant with political conditions myself I insist that there were other reasons for the revolution in Maine. From private sources of information I have ascertained that the electorate of Maine was tremendously influenced against the Republican party by the prevalence of the hobble skirt, the unaccountable delay in the marriage of Katharine Elkins to d'Abruzzi, the rupture between Lina Cavalieri and Bob Chanler, the refusal of Eleanor Sears to admit that she smokes cigarettes and the approaching visit of the Sultan of Sulu. Let the Tocsin ring again. I love its soul-stirring strident music.

The Exuberant Rah-Rah Boys

That the peculiar spirit of the Greek letter fraternities which impels college chappies to make night and day hideous with their unearthly howling of yells and catches and college songs does not expire when the rah-rah boys emerge from college was proved during the recent Greek letter convention in this city. Graduates and undergraduates alike the college chappies proved to be a collection of irrepressible cutups. Only once during their stay here were they repressed. One evening they held a jollification in the ball room of the St. Francis and as they tested their lungs to the limit of endurance all through the evening there is no doubt that their affair was a success. It ended about two o'clock in the morning, an hour at which most hotel guests are enjoying their best sleep. But nothing would do the rah-rah boys but that they should perform a serpentine dance down the stairs and through the lobby, at the same time emitting their favorite squawks and cackles. This was voted a splendid idea and the pandemonium started. And then it stopped. One of the assistant managers of the hotel appeared on the scene and uttered a few incisive remarks. While they may have lacked literary flavor they undoubtedly possessed force, for they quelled the turbulent Greek letter men and caused them to disperse silently in the direction of their several beds.

Local Chinese Revolutionists

Several months ago the arrival of a Chinese prince in this city was the signal for certain hostile demonstrations which effectively curbed the prince's freedom of movement, although fortunately nothing serious happened. Once again the menace of Chinese revolution was glimpsed by the white people of San Francisco when Prince Hsun arrived on Monday. Chinatown was a lively place on Monday night, what with inflammatory speech-making, parading revolutionists and fiery proclamations. The demonstrations were made by the Young China Association which is the local branch of the Chinese revolutionary society. This city is one of the hotbeds of Chinese revolutionary propaganda and it is not so very long since one of the revolutionary leaders of international fame came here secretly to give orders to his local lieutenants. Men familiar with Chinese affairs tell me that a revolt against the hated Manchus is closer at hand than ordinarily intelligent observers imagine.

A Honeycomb of Secret Societies

It is a remarkable fact that although the Manchu dynasty has held the throne of China for six centuries they are still regarded as foreigners by the Chinese. All the disturbances which have taken place in the Celestial Empire for many years have found their explanation in this deep rooted aversion. From an intelligent young Chinese who is identified with the reform propaganda I have learned some interesting particulars of the gigantic upheaval which is in prospect. China for centuries has been honeycombed with secret societies but it took the genius of Dr. Sun Yat Sen to bring them into concerted action. Dr. Sun Yat Sen plans the establishment of a Chinese republic after the model of the United States. He is working through the secret societies toward this end. All the societies are anti-dynastic and anti-foreign and from Mukden to Canton they are thoroughly organized. The greatest of them is the Sanhohu or Triad of which Dr. Sun Yat Sen is believed to be the head centre. Some authorities estimate the number of its members at 2,500,000; but others declare that it includes at least 10,000,000 of the 50,000,000 adult males in China. Its power reaches to Liverpool and Sydney as well as to this city and no delinquent member is safe from its emissaries. The Triad goes back to the year 1674. Its name signifies "Three United"—referring to heaven, earth and man. When these three have united to drive out the Manchus and all other foreign devils its members believe the perfect triangle will be formed and that universal peace will follow. There is every reason to believe that Dr. Sun Yat Sen plans an early test of the propitiousness of Heaven.

The Government Seem Powerless

Membership in the Chinese secret societies is practically compulsory, for when one is likely to be of service to the society in his district the local officials send him a paper bearing his seal. He is warned to present himself for initiation and threatened with murder if he should reveal the message. If he shows signs of hesitation he is attracted to the lodge by a ruse and once he takes the oath terror ever afterwards prevents him from breaking it. Members swear to help each other in every way and doubtful characters join with the object of pursuing vendettas, receiving aid in smuggling and evading the law. One of the lodge officials is an executioner and instances are known of intruders or "draughts of wind" as they are called, being promptly killed for approaching meetings. That such an organization has the power to turn the oriental world upside down is apparent. The government has been powerless to stem the tide of revolution. A reward of $50,000 has been offered for Dr. Sun Yat Sen's head but he carries it blithely on his shoulders. Arms are being constantly smuggled into China across the Russian frontier and gun running is common on the north coast. When the upheaval comes it will probably be one of the most momentous in history. Whether it will make Dr. Sun Yat Sen president of a Chinese republic is of course vague speculation. That is his ambition, however, and every time a Chinese prince comes to this city the propagandists find means to call it to the prince's attention in minatory fashion.

Everyone who has seen the new $15,000 drawing room of Mr. Withey at 315 Sutter street is delighted with the place. The room is 20x60 feet, is elegantly furnished and has a seating capacity when required for 125 people. It is well worthy of an inspection.

No heat, no smell, no smoke, no coal to bring in, no ashes to carry out. It does away with the drudgery of cooking, and makes it a pleasure. Women with the light touch for pastry especially appreciate it, because they can immediately have a quick fire, simply by turning a handle. No half-hour preparation. It not only is less trouble than coal, but it costs less. Absolutely no smell, no smoke; and it doesn't heat the kitchen.

The nickel finish, with the turquoise blue of the enameled chimneys, makes the stove ornamental and attractive. Made with 1, 2 and 3 burners; the 2 and 3-burner stoves can be had with or without Cabinet.

The Despised but Necessary Corset

Marcus Stone, whoever he may be, has added his drop to the bucket of the world's wisdom. According to Marcus the reason why the world is short of geniuses is because women wear corsets. It is only since the early years of the nineteenth century that mothers have gone corseted and no genius has been born since 1820 Q. E. D. The argument might be more convincing if it were only true. Considering the astonishing number of infant prodigies exploited every year the question would seem to be, not why no more geniuses are born but why they fail to grow up. In the matter of wearing corsets, if that has anything to do with the subject, the fact happens to be that they have been worn in one form or another by all women of the civilized races since the days of Cleopatra. The designation, corset, may be comparatively recent but the garment is nearly as old as time. Cleopatra called it a zora and made hers of stiffened linen when worn underneath but very frequently the much bejeweled and tightly laced giraffe was worn above the tunic. In the sixteenth century Catherine de Medicis appeared on the scene and being both meddlesome and energetic she proceeded to reform the costume of her day. She not only wore corsets herself but issued an edict commanding every lady of birth and breeding to don them likewise and to reduce the waist measure to thirteen inches. The garment was renamed the "corps" and was stiffened in every possible way, and when the body was finally pinched and screwed into it a corset cover composed of thin plates of steel, fashioned in two pieces and opening on a hinge, was clasped over it. This instrument of torture was worn until the early part of the seventeenth century when more pliable materials took the place of Catherine's invention, but in the early part of the eighteenth century leather stiffened with whalebone came into use. Again it was a case of nomenclature for the belles of that age wore not corsets but "busques," and neither the zora, the corps nor the busque appears to have fallen under the ban. We are often regaled with stories of the perfect figures and commendable slimness of our great grandmother, "who never wore a corset in her life," but one glimpse of a "boned waist" preserved from their ancient wardrobes would send a modern woman into nervous prostration. The garments were generally home made as was everything else of that day, but the material, evidently woven to withstand time and accident, was supplied with more bones and hooks than would answer for three pair of the modern article. One needs but to look at old pictures, whether they be family daguerreotypes or painted masterpieces reproducing the royalties and qualities, to note the rigid stiffness of the waists, not only of women but of little girls hardly more than able to stand alone. We hear much of the buxom beauty of peasant maids too, but it is worthy of notice that the "bodices" which are such a conspicuous feature of peasant costumes differ from the despised corset chiefly in being made of velvet or other dark goods and worn outside of the white waist. The chief article in the creed of the dress reformer is "Thou shalt not wear a corset," but every individual one of them has done "common sense" or "good form" or other denomination of "waist" which is in everything but the name a corset. If the wearing of corsets is the chief obstacle to the bearing of geniuses, how is it that the negroes, the Indians and the aborigines of the South Seas who have never known the restrictions of waist measurement, have never produced their quota? Corsets, like everything else, can be abused. No one yet has discovered a method of preventing the propagation of fools, but the garment, whatever name it is known by, is just as essential to women as are shoes and head coverings and the rest of the world may as well accept the fact.

He Admires Anna Held

Who is the prominent San Francisco attorney whose recent attentions to Anna Held in Paris have caused gossip on both sides of the Atlantic? That is a question which any number of local people are asking just now and some of them think that they could name the man. Miss Held's legal admirer from this city has monopolized so much conversation in the American colony in Paris that few have found time to wonder at the fair Anna's success as a climber. Yet it looks as though she has really invaded the sacred precincts of society. Mrs. A. Crocker has taken her under her wing and Anna is having such a triumph as a social butterfly that it is said that she will never return to the stage. At the Du Barry fete engineered by Mrs. Jackson Gouraud, our own Amy Crocker, Anna appeared as "Princess Talleyrand." Only a few days before she won the first prize in the floral fete, her victoria with four white horses having been inundated with white gardenias. Although Anna is supposed to have a snug fortune discreetly and safely invested it was reported that she graciously permitted the prominent San Francisco attorney to settle for the equipage and its decorations. Which brings us back to the original question, Who is he?

A Great Future for Santa Barbara

It looks as though Santa Barbara is going to be a great dwelling place for millionaires like Hillsborough, Pasadena and San Diego. Already the old mission town has passed the stage where it depended for its importance on one of the best hotels in the State. It is becoming the home of a new crop of millionaires, particularly of those who have fattened their fortunes in oil. Aside from the old Californian families the William Miller Grahams are the best known residents of Santa Barbara and "Bill" Graham is really the pioneer of the movement which bids fair to revolutionize Santa Barbara. Graham's example in building a great home in Santa Barbara will be followed by Ernest Wiltsee who has recently added oil to his string of money-making interests. Then there are Joe Chanslor, Danziger and other oil millionaires who have their eyes fixed on Santa Barbara as a place of permanent and luxurious abode.

The Grahams' Marble Palace

Many people are wondering why work has not yet begun on the big marble palace which the Miller Grahams planned to build on the site of their present beautiful Santa Barbara home. When Mrs. Graham departed for London it was pretty generally understood that the work of demolishing the present residence would be started immediately and that the architects were already at work on the blue prints for the marble palace. But months have passed and nothing has yet been done. Friends of the Grahams are speculating on the apparent abandonment of the project. They are wondering whether "Bill" Graham has found the satisfaction of his wife's social ambitions in London too great a drain on his purse. Of course the Grahams are very wealthy but there are plenty of millionaires who would not relish the enormous outlays which Mrs. Graham had to make to conquer English society. Not long ago it was announced that she had leased the mansion in Grosvenor Place which Mrs. Keppel had from King Edward as a Christmas present. Any one familiar with London rentals and the London cost of living knows how such an establishment would tax Mrs. Graham's income. Is it possible that "Bill" Graham deemed it expedient to postpone the construction of the marble palace until his wife returns in her crystal motor car to dazzle the eyes of the Santa Barbarians?

Mrs. Graham on Her Way Home

Mrs. Graham, by the way, is now returning in a leisurely manner from London, having sailed on the Mauretania two weeks ago. Before leaving London she took occasion to deny the statement that she had leased Mrs. George Keppel's house. She said that she intended to return to London next summer and that she would want a house at that time but that she had not yet made definite terms with anyone. Mrs. Graham exhibited a great deal of amusement at the reports which had been circulated about her. "One of them said that I was a widow," she gaily informed the newspapermen; "and another had it that I was engaged to Lord Robert Innes-Ker. A French paper went so far as to say that I had eloped with him. As a matter of fact I had not met Lord Robert at that time." Having become a personage of sufficient importance to receive unsought attention from the papers of three countries Mrs. Graham should regard her London season as an unqualified success.

Mrs. Martin's Remarkable Costume

Mrs. Peter Martin is one of the few women who can wear remarkable costumes with unconscious ease. Mrs. Frank Carolan is her only rival in this. Mrs. Martin wore a very remarkable creation in the tea room of the St. Francis during the week. Her gown was of shining black chiffon cloth, the skirt hobbled tightly with a wide band of black satin. There was a wide satin girdle, long white gloves and an enormous black satin hat weighted with sage-green plumes. Another striking detail was supplied by garish tan pumps and hosiery. It was all most becoming to Mrs. Martin though a less perfectly poised woman might have looked like a show-girl off duty. The same day Mrs. Frank Preston was at tea with friends wearing a black hobble skirted gown, the inevitable white elbow gloves and a long Persian scarf which made a distinctive note in the costume.

Why Not Have a Hobble Race?

Despite the example set by Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Preston there are precious few hobble skirts worn in society. The fact is that most of our exclusive women shy at a fashion about which they are not quite settled in their minds. Having an uneasy sense that it is a passing freak foisted upon femininity by the extremists among couturiers they are unwilling to give it sanction and then find themselves open to criticism by others closer in touch with the mysteries of mode. But if some few of our fashionables are to follow the example set by Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Preston, I have a suggestion to make. Why not have a hobble race as a feature of the next gymkana sponsored by society? I do not claim originality for the idea. One night not long ago two well known young ladies of New York who were somewhat exhilarated by a luxurious repast in one of the lobster palaces were induced by their escorts to run a hobble race of one block and the contest was highly relished by all who had the good fortune to witness it. Of course our hobble race would be conducted with more propriety. The vulgar would be excluded from the spectacle.

and would have to rely on the newspapers for second-hand knowledge of the affair. I am sure that if Miss Eleanor Sears were in town she would prize on this suggestion with avidity. Who will be so good as to add zest to social excitement by entering for the competition? Ladies, one at a time!

Mrs. Tevis' Appreciation

During her recent visit to Santa Barbara Mrs. Will Tevis spent much time at the De La Guerra mansion which is one of the most interesting houses in California. It is a one-story adobe built around three sides of a patio and housing several families, all De La Guerras of course. Mrs. Tevis was very much attracted by the historic associations of the place and since her return to San Francisco has bought a number of antique bits of furniture which she has sent as a gift to the members of the De La Guerra family. She also sent them several old paintings depicting the colorful life of Spanish days in California. It was a gracious expression of friendship and appreciation of the hospitality which she had frequently enjoyed in the old house. Mrs. Tevis is herself descended from a Spanish family. She was Miss Mabel Pacheco and her father's people intermarried with several prominent families of the old regime. So her interest is quite natural.

About Miss Peters

Dame Rumor simply will not let beautiful Miss Anna Peters alone. This charming Stockton belle who won a famous compliment from Charles Dana Gibson is always being reported engaged. This time the young chap whose name is linked with that of Miss Peters is not a newcomer in the field. Gossip had him engaged to Miss Peters before and the fact that he has been a guest at several house parties and has shown a great deal of attention to Miss Peters revives the rumor. The youth is Frank De Lisle, the real estate man, and some of Miss Peters' friends seem confident that there will be an early announcement.

She Will Not Make Her Bow

Owing to the death of her grandmother, Mrs. Tewksbury, Mauricia Mintzner has withdrawn from the ranks of the debutantes of the coming season. Mrs. Tewksbury had long made her home with her daughter, Mrs. Mintzner, and the family has always prided itself upon the luxuriant growth of its family tree. Mrs. Tewksbury's mother, after whom Mauricia was named, was a countess. Mrs. Mintzner was a Miss Eugenia Tewksbury, and when a mere girl was married to an English naval officer named Ware. He left her a widow with one child, a daughter Eugenia, who also married an Englishman. The Tewksburys were exceedingly wealthy, owning a great deal of land at Richmond, which has increased tremendously in value during the last few years, and most of this property Mr. Tewksbury left to his daughter. Mr. Mintzner is also wealthy and a lawyer by profession, so with such a prospective dot and the entertaining which the Mintzners had planned for Mauricia, it is certain she would have been a great belle. She and her mother will now turn their steps toward Paris, where Mauricia will acquire a postgraduate course.

A Strange Sight in San Rafael

That was a very strange procession which left the home of Mrs. Harrison Dibblee a few nights ago and made its way to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Dudley Bates. It was headed by a well known man who carried a huge wedding cake with a minnikin bridal couple done in candy.

Then came a prominent cit who carried two handsome gold compotiers. These were followed by a number of men and women who carried lighted birthday candles. It was a surprise party in celebration of the golden wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Dudley Bates. The Bates' had planned an evening at cards with their children, grandchildren and a few friends and they were amazed by the elaborate nature of the ceremonial which had been quietly planned and carried out by Mrs. Dibblee. It was a very merry evening of music and dancing and many handsome tokens were given to the old couple.

They Dined on Golden Chickens

Up from Santa Barbara comes the story of a dinner innovation which would arouse the admiration of Lucullus or Apicius if either of those gentlemen were still interested in the savory science of gastronomy. This is nothing less than the serving of chickens that had gold in their craws. It happened at the farewell dinner given at the Santa Barbara Country Club to the Mayo Newhalls and among those present were Sir Robert and Lady Hadfield, Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson, Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Edward White and others of equal prominence. As a part of the menu the chef ordered from a local market two dozen chickens. In cleaning these the gold was found. The nuggets weighed from a quarter to an ounce each, and while the mineral was not assayed it was declared to be almost a perfect composition of gold. At first the chef thought he would confiscate the treasure, say nothing about it and make a quiet search for the farm upon which the chickens grew, but he is an honest man and decided to tell the club patrons of his discovery. While the guests were in the midst of their repast, announcement of the find was made. The next day a party visited the butcher who had provided the chickens and endeavored to get information concerning the chickens he had sold the club. The butcher could not remember where these particular chickens came from, but thought it likely that they were brought to him from a ranch in the Santa Ynez river valley, where free gold was found in the early days.

"The Easiest Way," a Surprise

By Edward F. O'Day

These stern-eyed censors of stage immorality who condemn "The Easiest Way" as a strange new menace to the virtue of theatergoers and these emotional critics who sobbingly confess that the Walter drama makes an epoch in their lives—have they never seen Pinero's "Iris"? Does the kept woman who tries to play both ends against the middle and gets caught appear as an entirely new figure within their ken? The questions cannot fail to suggest themselves to one who sat through the play at the Columbia with intent interest and unusual enjoyment. We had been led to believe that the production of "The Easiest Way" marked a new depth of wickedness for the American stage; that its appeal was to rounders and demireps, not to respectable people. Judging from the pulpit fulminations it brought the blush of shame to the hardy cheeks of veteran preachers; it was more dangerously evil than the stupid "Girl from Rector's"; it was sapping the foundations of American etiquette and ad libitum. Knowing nothing of take the trouble to make the comparison they would find to their surprise that "The Easiest Way" is the less objectionable play of the two. Certainly they would be forced to admit that there is a carnal element in "Iris," a highly emphasized carnal element, which is altogether lacking in the American drama. Walter handles his material with unusual restraint and seems to get no credit for doing so. He might easily have descended to the crudity which Cleveland Moffett displayed in the tangy love-making scene of "The Battle," but Walter is a fine technician while Moffett is not and he eliminated everything which did not suit his purpose. That purpose was to develop a theme which is a commonplace of conversation. Men and women who rub elbows humanly with their neighbors know that plenty of men have their mistresses and that the situation involves frequent complications. Until life is very different from what it is now—which will be about one week before the millennium—these complications cannot be excluded from the conversations of grownups. The fact that they are rarely discussed with the frowning fervor of denunciation peculiar to the pulpit does not indicate that they are condoned. Ordinary men and women with average respect for the two tablets of stone chatter about all the serious things of life in tones of conventional frivolity and back of the frivolity there is probably as much charity and as little hypocrisy as is to be found in pulpits. In "The Easiest Way" the tone of discussion, the method of treatment is far from frivolous so it is difficult to understand why the professional moralists who are forever striking for their altars and their fires and who yearn for a serious and elevated stage are not to the fore with approbation instead of censure. Far be it from me to say that "The Easiest Way" is a sermon, for I would not seem to imply that the stage and the pulpit are interchangeable; but it certainly tells more about the wages of sin than half a hundred sermons which I have heard. Dealing with a legitimate subject of stage discussion—for I take it that every topic which is a legitimate subject of conversation between mature men and women is fit for treatment on the stage—and dealing with it according to the best canons of dramatic art, "The Easiest Way" is a great play, a play of which those who take delight in watching the progress of the American theater should be very proud, but it is not by any means a revolutionary play as some of the critics who have been "emothing" about it seem to think. It would deserve much higher praise if Pinero had not written "Iris," but he did and consequently Walter cannot be given the credit of developing his subject by means of original situations. It is sufficient praise for him that he has hit as close to this kind of life as Pinero did. Personally I would rather have written "The Easiest Way" than "Iris" which is probably saying no more than that I am more familiar with American than with English ways.

Turning from the play to the players it is a pleasure to join the chorus of praise which has been sung for Frances Starr and her associates. Miss Starr is the same pretty girl whom we all used to admire so much in her Alcazar days. Six years have not made any difference in her looks and to see her again brought back vividly the memory of many pleasant days in the little Moorish playhouse of O'Farrell street. Six years have naturally improved her acting but not beyond the measure of what we all thought she would some day accomplish. Her success has been more rapid than anybody would have dreamed six years ago but it is thoroughly justified by her handling of the role of Laura Murdock. She never overdoes it, she never falls short. It is all very delicate and sure. When she suffers her suffering is very real, when she is happy her happiness is infectious and when she is petulant it is no wonder that Brockton curses. Brockton is played by Joseph Kilgour, an actor whom Alcazar patrons of ten years ago will remember. He is as convincing in his part as Frances Starr is in hers. The little touches that give verisimilitude to the character are admirably portrayed and the audience is quick to understand and approve them. His cynicism is undiluted and pleasurably distant from all the stock tricks of that unmitigated bore, the stage villain. If Kilgour is ever tempted to stray from

Eugene Walter's dramatic methods I was prepared for a play which would make new meets and bounds for theatrical daring. I did not expect to be shocked, for as an omnivorous reader of newspapers I am well nigh shock-proof, but I thought my breath would be taken away by a certain amount of brutality and frankness carried to five decimal places. Judge of my surprise when I discovered that "The Easiest Way" deals with an age-old theme in pretty much the same manner as it has been dealt with in all periods of dramatic virility. The kept woman is one of the most familiar figures on the stage. It is not necessary to mention Sappho or Camille or Zaza because her more recent incarnation in Iris invites the mind to a comparison between the Walter and the Pinero play. Perhaps if the cold moralists who make us shiver in our thin rags of virtue every time they blow their icy blasts would the author's meaning to gain an effect there is no evidence of the temptation in his acting. The rest of the cast—and there are only four others in it—are on a high plane. The hallmark of the Belasco training is everywhere apparent.

It is interesting to note the return of Henry Miller to the field of comedy. Theatergoers will see him in the farcical "Her Husband's Wife" and will be able to compare his acting with his earlier work in such performances as "All the Comforts of Home," "The Importance of Being Earnest," etc.

What the Orpheum Offers

Every week the lover of vaudeville scans the announcements for news of the offerings at the Orpheum. According as these announcements appeal or do not appeal to him he marks the week with a white or a black stone. But in his urn there are very few black stones, for the Orpheum maintains a standard which places it among the marvels of Vaudeville. During the past three weeks of September the bills have been uniformly good and there is every evidence that the high average is to be maintained. The specifications for the coming week are interesting. Every Orpheumite knows and likes Willie Howard, the Hebrew impersonator. He and his brother are listed as bill-toppers. This season their song and comedy act is called "The Porter and the Salesman" and the word is passed along that it is a scream. Victor Smalley's playlets are usually high class and it is said that his latest, "Baseballitis" is unusually high class. The plot involves a young lawyer who is an inveterate fan, his bosom friend who is ditto and his wife who is jealous of the national pastime and formulates a method of curing hubby's infatuation. They say that Smalley has "fattened his batting average" with this skit. I wonder if it's as good as "Swat Milligan"? Amati of Cremona who made the world's greatest violins invade vaudeville under the personal direction of Fred Singer who has a dainty musical novelty of more than ordinary attractiveness. The old fiddle-maker has a vision during which the virtuosos of succeeding centuries—Paganini, Joachim, Sarasate and Kubelik—play upon his instrument. The originality of this situation condones for the impossibility of adequately imitating the masters. The Three Peaches are said to be peacherino dancers and singers. They appear with Tom Smith in a school room skit, "Their First Lesson." The songs were written by Joe Hart. The holdovers are all good—Linton and Laurence, the Waterburys, Tenny, Lane and O'Donnell and the Lambs' Club sketch, "Dinkelspiel's Christmas."

Regina Vicarino Sings Violetta

It has been said that Regina Vicarino, the prima donna of the Bevani Opera Company at the Garrick Theater, sings the role of Violetta in "La Traviata" better than any soprano who has been heard here since Luisa Tetrazzini sang it at the New Tevoli Opera House shortly before the fire. There is assuredly no exaggeration in this statement, but it is not sufficient. Violetta was probably one of Tetrazzini's least satisfactory roles vocally and physically while it is probably Vicarino's best. This young singer who has had the advantage of a New York season with Hammerstein bids fair to achieve great fame in her profession. She has pleasing looks, a very graceful bearing, considerable dramatic talent and a voice of rare quality. It is no effort for her, apparently, to take the top notes and nowhere in the scale does she lose her fluency, her clarity and her sweetness of utterance. The two songs at the end of the first act of "La Traviata," "Ah, Fors' E Lui" and "Sempre Libera," represent two distinct moods of the temperamental Violetta and it is no small achievement for a singer to pass from the pensive joy of the first to the gay abandon of the second. Regina Vicarino makes the transition easily and it would be a task to decide whether she is more effective in the one or the other. Her entire performance being so good it is almost useless to specify particular beauties but there is no doubt that she rises to an unusual height in the great "Parigio Cara" duet and the death scene was exquisite. The second honors of "La Traviata" went to Achille Alberti whose rich baritone was heard to splendid effect in the role of Germont. The audience was not content until he had repeated the beautiful "Di Provenza Il Mar." Eugenio Battain was an Alfredo worthy of Vicarino's Violetta.

Zangwill's Play at Savoy

Margaret Illington will make her last appearances at the Savoy in "Until Eternity" this Saturday afternoon and evening and on Sunday night "The Melting Pot," Israel Zangwill's great play, with Walker Whiteside in the principal role, will begin an engagement limited to one week. In "The Melting Pot" Israel Zangwill, himself a Jew, has advanced the idea of wiping out the religious differences between Jew and Gentile and the fusing together in the crucible of American citizenship and American life of all the old racial prejudices. Walker Whiteside will be seen in his original role of David Quixane, a young Russian Jew composer whose parents have been butchered at Kischinef. Liebler and Company are the managers of Mr. Whiteside's tour and they have given the star most capable support, while the production is up to the high standard established by this well known theatrical firm. The usual popular priced matinee will be given on Thursday.

Last Week of Frances Starr

Frances Starr in Eugene Walter's play "The Easiest Way" has filled the Columbia during the past week and duplicated its triumphs throughout the East. It will enter upon its second and last week on Monday night. There will be matinees Wednesday and Saturday. The final performance is announced for Saturday night, October 1. Henry Miller is coming to the Columbia on Monday night, October 3, bringing one of the latest and most amusing of modern comedy hits. It is called "Her Husband's Wife." Laura Hope Crews will appear in the leading feminine role. The advance sale of seats begins Thursday.

The Bevani Program

The bill for the matinee at the Garrick today (Saturday) will be "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci" with Frery, Francini, De Dreux, Sacchetti, Giuliani, Campana and Secci Corsi. Tonight "Lucia" will be sung with Vicarino in the title role in which she scored such a success last Monday night. The other principal roles will be interpreted by Battain, Alberti, Bevani and Giuliani. Tomorrow Sunday (matinee) "Martha" will be the opera with Francini, De Dreux, Sacchetti, Campana and Florian. Tomorrow night by special request "Il Trovatore" will be given with Frery, Jarman, Battain, Alberti and Florian. The program for next week will be as follows: Monday and Wednesday nights "Love Tales of Hoffman" for the last times with Vicarino, De Dreux, Scherzer, Sacchetti, Alberti and Florian; Tuesday night "Rigoletto" with Francini, De Dreux, Battain, Campana and Bevani; Thursday night and Saturday matinee "La Boheme." This will be produced with a considerably augmented orchestra and an excellent cast which will include Francini, Newcombe, Battain, Campana, Secci Corsi, Bevani, Giuliani and Florian. Friday night "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci" will be repeated.

Social Satire at the Alcazar

"Clothes," the satire on New York society which is to be given its first western presentation during the coming week at the Alcazar, was constructed by two playwrights who are favorably known to San Francisco theatergoers. They are Avery Hapgood whose "Seven Days" is the reigning laugh-provoker and Channing Pollock, author of "Such a Little Queen." In "Clothes" there is something more than clever fun-making. While the silly fads and foibles of Gotham's uppertendom are shrewdly ridiculed, a story brimming with heart interest is unfolded with fine dramatic skill. Elizabeth Stewart, the actress who scored a triumph as Maritana in Hackett's production of "D. Caesar's Return," is specially engaged to play the leading role. In the cast with her are all the Alcazar favorites and several extra people. Thurston Hall, Howard Hickman, Burt Warner, Louis Bennison, Thomas Chatterton, Adele Belgarde, Grace Barbour, Victory Bannan, Laura Adams and Lucille Culver have good roles.

New Book Play at Ye Liberty

In "A Little Brother of the Rich" which the Bishop players present at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, next week, Manager Bishop has secured one of the newest of the book plays. Although the piece is entirely new to Western audiences, its production last winter in New York City with such stars as Vincent Serrano, Hilda Spong and Ida Conquest in the cast was a pronounced success and was duplicated in many of the other large Eastern cities. Joseph Medill Patterson's book of the same title made something of a sensation on its appearance about two years ago. It was advertised as an exposition of current manners and morals and evoked much discussion and widespread interest. In all fairness however it must be said that the play differs from the book in many of its essential features. Manager Bishop promises an excellent production of the play. Sydney Ayres and Miss Muriel Hope have the leading roles and Catherine Calhoun, seen recently at the Alcazar in this city, will be among the others in the cast.

The Music at Idora

The musical people of this city are awake to the value of the music that is now being offered at Idora Park in Oakland. The Ellery Bar which was engaged to insure a brilliant close to the season has more than justified all claims made for it as the finest concert-band in America. Its concerts are a revelation in the possibilities of wind-instrument music and are quite on a level with the performances of the best opera companies and symphony orchestras. Special programs have been arranged for every evening next week and novelties will be introduced in the way of scenic effects to accompany some of the descriptive numbers.

The result of thirty years of experience and well-applied effort, an unexcelled product. Four stores: Phelan Building, Fillmore at Ellis, Van Ness at Sutter and 28 Market St. near Ferry.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The stock market during the recent week has been characterized by much irregularity and an uncertain trend as the result of professional operations and manipulative tactics by leading market interests. The heaviest feature in the security list has been steel common which has reflected the heavy curtailment in the industry and the reduction of prices in the finished products; hence we find the movement in this security logical, considering the times. Further retrenchment by the steel corporation will undoubtedly be followed by lower prices for these stocks. While crops have finished out splendidly for the year, the business situation is far from satisfactory as a result of political tension throughout the country and rate making difficulties between the railroads and Interstate Commerce Commission. This situation is likely to remain unchanged for a considerable time. We might say that a poor security market seems inevitable for some weeks yet. We believe, however, that on any material weakness good stocks can be bought with safety.

Wheat—One very large short covered a big line of wheat on a declining market, another large short and countless small ones covered on a very unimportant rally in the last week. Meanwhile winter wheat millers had a material increase in their trade, partly the result of a shutting out of the impossible priced northwestern spring wheat. No improvement has been seen in the way of sales for export, apparently none of American production being made, and therefore the legitimate situation is not much different from that of a week ago. If there is a burdensome surplus above domestic needs, wheat seems destined sometime, if for a brief period only, to get to a basis that will relieve the trade of the load. That the surplus is burdensome at present is amply evidenced by the wide carrying charges. The latter, however, have narrowed down about one cent in the last week, partly because of the better flour trade, partly because of the lapse of time and partly because of the more optimistic speculative sentiment caused by the big buying to cover shorts.

Corn—Prices ignored the improvement in wheat and oats, having influences of their own that were of paramount importance. The big corn crop is rapidly coming to safety, each day of good weather during the last week bringing many millions of bushels over the line. Killing frost would still impair the quality of a great deal of corn in the big surplus producing States, but it would not greatly reduce the bulk of the crop. The latter now seems safely the largest that this country ever raised unless the government is seriously at fault in its estimate of the acreage.

Cotton—The cotton market the past week has been held within a very narrow range with prices generally higher than the previous week. The news has been mostly in favor of the bulls but speculation is at a very low ebb and it requires constant buying to keep prices at the present level. Heavy rains and hailstorms early in the week did considerable damage to cotton in Texas which was followed by cool unseasonable weather and there was some talk of an early frost. A change to better weather in the latter part of the week was the signal for renewed selling by the bear crowd and resulted in a weak close with prospects of lower prices during the coming week. Receipts of cotton, while not at all large, seem to be sufficient to supply the present demand and of course in time will become a burden on the market unless the mills show more disposition to take the offerings. Curtailment is general all over the country and the mill men seem determined to force the producer to part with his cotton at lower prices. The foreigner is only buying what cotton he must have immediately and is not making any long time contracts. In fact labor troubles are beginning to become serious in Manchester and a general lock-out is threatened. All things taken into consideration, cotton looks high at 13 cents with a fair crop coming to market and it remains to be seen what action the manufacturer will take. If he continues his present attitude of buying on a hand to mouth basis prices will undoubtedly go lower. The dry goods trade is said to be poor.

Copper—The metal market remains practically unchanged around 12 1-8. The market for copper stocks is likely to back and fill until there is something definite to encourage a fixed position. The long side on weak spots, we think, is the correct play for the speculator.

No Fake About That

A comedian was rehearsing his part in a new play, the author of which was present. The actor departed once or twice from the "book," and "gagged," or inserted jokes of his own. The author was horrified at the idea of such tampering with his work and he told the comedian he must desist.

"My dear boy," he said, "be good enough not to 'gag,' please. Speak my lines and wait for the laugh."

"All right," said the comedian, sorrowfully: "only my last train goes at midnight."

"That last speaker," said the first guest at the banquet, "was quite entertaining."

"Yes," replied the other, "and he's a self-made man, too."

"I can't say, though, that I liked his delivery. It was rather slow."

"Oh! naturally. He began life as a messenger boy."

Marginal Companionship

By the Bookworm

In the days when a novel was still something of a surprise it was the custom to read closely and attentively and to be provoked into marginal criticisms and exclamations. Stop at a book-stall and pick up a faded novel published eighty years ago, and the chances are that you will find evidence of many readers. For reading was a serious business then and the author was subjected to a closer scrutiny than he is today. When, for instance, he takes risks and lets fly with a daring epigram or two, it is likely that you will find penciled in the margin the indignant words "What nonsense!" Another time, when he makes one of his character artistically repellent, you may be sure of finding "Villain!" But appreciation is as common as indignation or criticism. Whole passages of moralizing are underlined, and the author is often comforted still further by the heartfelt exclamation "How true!" Sometimes one marginal note is followed by another from a different pen. The first reader may have thought that Rebecca was wrong when she refused the ardent hero, and may have said so in a few terse words, such as "How heartless of her!" The second disagrees with this, and writes immediately beneath "Rebecca was right; John was much too conceited," making her correction the more earnest by adding her initials.

It is good to read these books, if only for the sake of the marginal companionship. To the ordinary excitement of reading there is added the more rare excitement of being able to compare impressions with earlier adventurers on the same journey. At any moment you may come across someone on the road and find that he is going your way. What he says is a sure index of his destination, and it is good to know that the journey need not be done alone. A provocative passage comes, and there in the margin are two different impressions, one in a nervous shaky hand as if written by an old man and the other in the round confident hand of youth. You can choose your company. Clearly both are going their ways, and the decision must be made at once. Shall nothing be risked and the older man be hailed, or would it be better to make a comrade of the young impetuous reader who so indignantly dismisses the cynical reflections of the author? For a long road an optimist is needed, someone who will find sunlight even in the shaded woods and will not watch the horizon for a coming storm. Why not risk something and choose the younger hopeful traveler who will not shelter on the way? Hardy would be less disheartening if one could be certain of the right marginal companion. His despair would be robbed of its sting by the sound of a cheerful voice. To take the road with him alone is indeed to set out on a dark journey. For he travels by night and there is nothing ahead but looming blackness which will let no light through. There are books that can only be read alone, but there are more that are the better for companionship. "Tess" is one of these, and calls for sunny laughter and the ambitious protest of youth. At the end of the road, when Hardy abruptly leaves you, there is a tendency to look round for someone who will say a cheerful word, and laugh perhaps. It is then that the vacant margin is depressing.

Unluckily a book is now so everyday a thing that no one is provoked into marginal activity. Reading is no longer a rare adventure, but rather a common indulgence calling for nothing but an easy chair. Morley's advice always to read with a pen in your hand, which would have been the better if it had referred to the margin instead of to a note-book, falls on barren soil. The exertion of plain reading is enough, and there is no time for making notes. Strangely too there is a prejudice against an occupied margin. Most readers want the whole book to themselves and deal impatiently with any casual acquaintance they may make. It is difficult to understand this. Reading is a cold and lonely business without some marginal companion.

The Physicians of the Murine Eye Remedy Company, Chicago, U. S. A., Oculists of years' standing, carefully prepare "The Murine Eye Remedies" in the Company's Laboratory. These Remedies are the result of their Clinical, Hospital and Private Practice, and they have found from their years of experience with Children's Eyes, that two drops of Murine in each Eye of the Growing Child is of inestimable value. Murine is an Eye Tonic and they know, if it is used regularly, that it Tones the Eye of the Growing Child and in many instances obviates the use of Glasses, and is it not reasonable that Glasses when not required will retard the development of a young and growing Eye?

Murine, through its Tonic effect, Stimulates Healthy Circulation and thus promotes the normal development of the Eye. We do not believe there is a Mother who has used Murine in her own Eyes and in the Eyes of the members of her family who would be without it, or who is not willing to speak of its Merits as The Household Friend.

The Child in the Schoolroom needs Murine. Murine contains no harmful or prohibited Drugs, and conforms to the Laws of the Country.

Druggists everywhere will supply Murine and tell you of its gratifying results.

The Little Beggar Boy

By Sviatozar Charovich

I often saw him passing the market-place, pale, weary and ragged. It was pitiful to look at him. He never begged—he simply stopped before you and stretched out his little hand with such a sad look in his eyes that even if you had a heart of stone you could not pass him without giving him something.

His name was Mirko.

But let me tell you the story:

It was a cold, winter day. The wind whistled obstinately, lifting whole clouds of dust from the ground and, after carrying them up high enough, scattered them on all sides. Here it tore off a board from a roof; there it tore off the whole straw-roof from some poor hut and broke in the windows.

The square was almost deserted; all the people who had something to do there had hidden away in the stores and stalls where they warmed themselves, drank their coffee and spoke of the news of the day.

And poor Mirko pressed close to the corner of one of the stores and blew upon his finger-tips, trying to warm them a little with his warm breath. He wore a long jacket, and this, and especially the sleeves, was full of holes through which the wadding was falling out. The knees of his richly patched trousers were so worn that the naked flesh of the boy looked through. Shoes he had none, and he stamped his feet to get them warmed.

Seeing Simo the baker, who was passing with a basket full of bread, he came out of the corner and stood in the street so that Simo could notice him.

"What are you doing here, you whelp?" Simo shouted at him.

"I stand."

"Well, then you may stand if you want to!"

And the baker passed on, shouting at the top of his voice:

"Fresh bread!"

Though Mirko could smell the hot bread and was very hungry, he did not run after him to beg for some, but returned to his corner and continued to blow upon his fingers and to jump from foot to foot.

"What are you doing here?" a bigger boy, an apprentice from a nearby shop, asked him.

"Nothing."

"Why don't you go in and get warm?"

"And where shall I go?"

And the boy passed on.

A short time afterwards, a gentleman passed. He was richly dressed, like a pasha, and strutted as proudly as if he owned a good half of the globe. Suddenly he saw Mirko and stopped:

"Whose boy are you?"

"A Servian," replied Mirko, and looked at him with his sad, dark eyes.

"What is your name?"

"Mirko."

"What are you doing here?"

"Nothing."

The gentleman took pity on him, pulled out his purse and gave him a small coin.

"Here, take it and buy bread."

Mirko's eyes lighted up when he felt the money in his hand.

"Thank you!" he shouted after him.

"And do you know who he is?" a stall-keeper who had come out in time to see what happened asked him.

"How should I know?"

"It is Bashitz, the one who murdered three Servians. Trust me, I know him well!"

Mirko grew rigid.

"Are you sure?"

"Certainly I am!"

A moment Mirko stood and looked thoughtfully at the coin, suddenly he pressed it tightly in his fist and started to run.

"Where are you running?" the stall-keeper shouted after him.

But Mirko did not turn round; he ran like mad, with his whole strength, not allowing himself even to catch his breath; at last he overtook the man.

"Sir!" he called.

"What do you wish?"

"Here is your money!"

"Why, do you not want it?" the man asked, surprised.

"No!"

"Why don't you want it, poor boy?"

"Because I don't, that is all!" And, throwing the coin at the man's feet, he returned to his corner and once more began to blow his fingers and to stand first on one foot, then on the other.

Auto Notes

According to advices received by S. G. Chapman the Hupmobile is fast assuming a position of importance among the American made cars which are invading the foreign field. In response to a direct order which came through Amsterdam the Hupmobile Motor Car Company has shipped a Hupmobile to Dr. Vinkhuysen, a resident of Djernber, Java.

Nine thousand miles with only one puncture is the record established by the Diamond tires that equip the rear wheels of the E-M-F car belonging to S. E. Johnson of San Francisco.

Among the firms of national reputation which are using White Trucks is the Prest-o-lite Company which operates one of these vehicles in connection with its Boston factory.

The Munsey Tour, distinguished this year above all former seasons because of the strenuous going encountered, has just added another to the notable line of victories achieved by Firestone tires in various automobile contests throughout the country this spring and summer.

J. W. Schwabacher who has been touring Europe this spring and summer in his Chalmers car writes to a friend that he has already covered 6,000 miles in the old world without one stop on account of car trouble.

Manager Whipple of the Fresno branch of the Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co. has been in San Francisco looking over the new stock recently received by the local branch of the firm and placing orders for further shipments to the Fresno store.

One of the most extensive tours made this season in the West has just been started by A. D. Plughoff, vice-president of the J. W. Leavitt Company in a Marion Bobcat. Accompanying Plughoff is E. G. Burnthal of the Weinstock, Nichols Company. Before returning to San Francisco in excess of 2,600 miles will have been covered over some of the hardest roads in the State.

Among the San Franciscans who went to the Sacramento State Fair recently in the interests of the Panama-Pacific Exposition was E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Company. While there Brinegar visited the big tent automobile display and reports the show a great success.

The automobile as a means of transportation for officers and men is an element of the gravest importance in times of military operations. The use of the automobile for this purpose was thoroughly demonstrated during the military operations around Boston. General Leonard Wood covered during the week of mimic war, according to his own estimate, 250 miles a day in a White Steamer and at the conclusion of the maneuvers expressed himself as more than pleased with the service rendered.

C. H. Howard, president of the Howard Automobile Company, is at present in Portland, Oregon, looking after the opening of the new Howard branch in that city. Advices received from him by the local branch state that the location selected is ideal and that the coming of the Howard Company is looked upon as a matter of great importance by the automobile fraternity of that section.

Advices have just been received by S. G. Chapman from the factory that the Hupmobile Coupe which had been originally advertised at $1350 delivered in San Francisco would sell here at $1200. This inside drive car is one of the real innovations of this season's automobile devices and is creating a big sensation all over the country.

Thirteen thousand miles on a Goodyear tire is the record just made on a Franklin Car, according to word received by Al. Leonard, manager of the local branch of the W. D. Newerf Rubber Company, from Lewis Denker of Los Angeles. Denker is well known and is considered one of the hardest drivers on the coast.

While in Colorado recently George P. Moore, Pacific Coast representative of the New York Lubricating Oil Company, put the distribution of Monogram Oils for Denver and immediate territory in the hands of the Fry & McGill Motor Supply Co.

1911 CHALMERS MOTOR CARS

WILL ARRIVE AUGUST 15th

Refined But Practically Unchanged 1909 and 1910 Good Enough

The Chalmers cars come from a factory producing quality and not quantity. THE CHALMERS PRINCIPLE is not to make as many cars as possible, but TO MAKE EACH INDIVIDUAL CAR AS GOOD AS POSSIBLE.

We regret that we were not able to furnish 1909 and 1910 models to all who wanted them, and while we fear that some were offended when told that they could not get the cars they wanted, we assure every one that it is much harder to tell a prospective buyer that he cannot have the car than it is to show him why he should have one.

It is possible that the Chalmers factory could build a sufficient number of cars to take care of every available customer, but in so doing they would, like a large number of other factories, sacrifice quality for quantity, and every car sold would not make a customer for another, as has been our experience during the past two years.

A few cars are still available for September delivery.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 22,624.

HUGO G. POHEIM, ARTHUR T. POHEIM, KATHIE H. POCKWITZ and LEO POCKWITZ (her husband), Plaintiffs, vs. All Persons Claiming any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or any Part Thereof, Defendants.

Action in rem brought against all the world in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the complaint filed in said City and County in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Hugo G. Poheim, Arthur T. Poheim, Kathie H. Pockwitz and Leo Pockwitz (her husband), the above-named plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

That certain lot of land, with the improvements thereon, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly bounded and described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at the point where the westerly line of Valencia Street intersects the northerly line of Twenty-first Street; thence running westerly on said northerly line of Twenty-first Street ninety (90) feet; thence at right angles northerly fifty (50) feet; thence at right angles westerly twenty (20) feet; thence at right angles northerly thirty-eight (38) feet; thence at right angles easterly and parallel with Twenty-first Street one hundred and ten (110) feet to the westerly line of Valencia Street; and thence at right angles southerly along said line of Valencia Street eighty-eight (88) feet to said northerly line of Twenty-first Street, to point of commencement; being a part of Mission Block Number Seventy-three (73).

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: The judgment of this Court establishing plaintiffs' title to said real property and determining all adverse claims thereto, and declaring plaintiffs to be the owners in fee simple absolute of all the above described real property and each and every part thereof free and clear of any liens or encumbrances, and for general relief and costs of suit.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 15th day of August, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

(Seal) By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

Memorandum—The first publication of this summons was made in Town Talk, a newspaper, on the 27th day of August, A. D. 1910.

Memorandum—The following persons are said to claim an interest in or lien upon said property adverse to plaintiff with the addresses of such persons set respectively opposite their names: Name, The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society; address, Jones and McAllister Streets.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MORTGAGED

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 10,340, N. S., Old Number 26,928, Department No. 9, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of MARY ANN ARMSTRONG, Deceased.

Albert Knorp, George Knorp and Frank Knorp, as Executors of the Last Will of Mary Ann Armstrong, deceased, having this day filed herein their duly verified petition praying for an order authorizing them to mortgage the real property hereinafter described, belonging to the estate of said decedent.

It is hereby ordered and directed that all persons interested in the estate of said Mary Ann Armstrong, deceased, be and they are hereby directed to appear before said Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, Department Number Nine thereof, on Wednesday, the 12th day of October, 1910, at ten o'clock a. m. of said day, at the Courtroom of said Department in the Grant Building, southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the same being the time and place hereby fixed for the hearing of said petition, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why the following described real property situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

First—Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Ellis Street, distant thereon 192 feet 3 inches westerly from the westerly line of Van Ness Avenue, running thence westerly along said northerly line of Ellis Street 55 feet; thence at right angles northerly 120 feet, thence at right angles easterly and parallel with Ellis Street 55 feet; thence at right angles southerly 120 feet and to the place of beginning. Being a portion of Western Addition Block Old Number Eighty-one (81). New Number Five Hundred and Three (503).

Second—Commencing at a point on the southerly line of McAllister Street, distant thereon one hundred and thirty-eight (138) feet and four (4) and one-half (½) inches easterly from the easterly line of Van Ness Avenue, and thence running easterly along said southerly line of McAllister Street thirty-eight (38) feet and four (4) and one-half (½) inches; thence at a right angle southerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to the northerly line of Ash Avenue; thence at a right angle westerly along said line of Ash Avenue thirty-eight (38) feet and four (4) and one-half (½) inches, and thence at a right angle northerly one hundred and twenty (120) feet to said southerly line of McAllister Street and the point of commencement. Being a part of Western Addition Block Old Number Sixty-six (66). New Number Four Hundred and Seventy (470).

or such part thereof as to the Court may see meet, should not be mortgaged for the sum of Ten Thousand Dollars ($10,000.00) or such lesser sum as to the Court may seem just, as prayed for in the petition on file, reference to which is hereby made for further particulars.

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four (4) successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Dated: September 1st, 1910.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Department No. 2, No. 22,256.

OGDEN MILLS as Executor of the Will of DARIUS OGDEN MILLS, Deceased, Plaintiff, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ogden Mills as Executor of the Will of Darius Ogden Mills, deceased, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three (3) months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

First Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred (100) feet southerly from the southeasterly corner of Golden Gate Avenue (formerly Tyler Street) and Octavia Street, and running thence southerly along the said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly one hundred (100) feet to the easterly line of Octavia Street and to the point of commencement; being a portion of Fifty Vara Lot Number Four (4) in Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152) of the Western Addition of said City and County of San Francisco.

Second Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet southerly from the southerly corner of Golden Gate Avenue (formerly Tyler Street) and Octavia Street, and running thence southerly along the said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at a right angle easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at a right angle westerly one hundred (100) feet to the easterly line of Octavia Street and to the point of commencement; being a portion of Fifty Vara Lot Number Four (4) in Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152) of the Western Addition of said City and County of San Francisco.

Third Parcel—All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Octavia Street, distant thereon one hundred and fifty (150) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Golden Gate Avenue with the easterly line of Octavia Street; running thence southerly along said easterly line of Octavia Street twenty-five (25) feet; running thence at right angles easterly one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and running thence at right angles westerly one hundred (100) feet to the said easterly line of Octavia Street and point of commencement; being a portion of Western Addition Block Number One Hundred and Fifty-two (152).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that Ogden Mills and Elisabeth Mills Reid are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute and that their title to said property be established and quieted, and subject only to the possession of plaintiff for the purposes of administration; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other relief as may be met in the premises.

A Book for Housewives

The H. M. Calwell Company has issued another of "Louis's Books," of recipes compiled by the celebrated Louis Muckensturm, uniform in size and general appearance with his "Salads and Chafing Dish Recipes" and "Mixed Drinks." "Every Woman's Cook Book" presupposes that every woman who essays to profit by it is already capable of preparing the meals for her own household, and omits such preliminaries as deal with the elementary matters of building a proper fire, boiling and salting water and plucking and cleaning fowls. On the other hand, it is not intended for the use of professional caterers, but for that large class who either manage their own culinary departments or are dependent on the help of one maid. There is a commendable consideration of costs which will be appreciated by people of moderate means who are usually halted in consternation at the easy, off-hand directions to "take a dozen yolks of eggs," with no provision for using the remainder, or a quantity of some high priced wine to add flavor to some other ingredient. "Louis" begins, very properly, with some hints as to the latest methods of setting a table, the small trifles which vary from season to season. Soups, soup-stocks, joints, game, poultry, vegetables, eggs, sauces and sweets are all treated in due course and at length, the recipes differing from those of the ordinary cook book. Many of the dishes are designed for solving the problem of the left-over. Besides the usual blank pages left for the insertion of private recipes often handed down in families as heirlooms, every second page is also blank with the exception of the three headings, "When Served," "Guests," "Remarks," so that the methodical housewife can keep an account of her entertainments and avoid the mistake of serving the same guests too often with the same dishes. The conveniently arranged index, together with the shape of the book and the excellent, clear type in which it is printed make it easy for reference, a decided consideration for any book which is designed for ready use.

The Autumn Book Crop

Whatever other faults can be attributed to Jack London, no one can accuse him of lack of diligence. The Macmillans announce a new novel, "Burning Daylight," to be issued by them in October, and a volume of short stories, "When God Laughs," for November 9, besides a drama, "Theft," to appear later in the season.

The preliminary lists of autumn books promise more in the way of solid satisfaction than has been the case for several seasons past. Besides the two new books by Jack London, the Macmillans have in hand "The Doctor's Christmas Eve," formerly announced as "The Brood of the Eagle," the second number of James Lane Allen's Christmas Trilogy, following "The Bride of the Mistletoe," which created so much comment when it appeared just before the holiday season two years ago. There is a new volume of child stories by Josephine Dodge Daskam or Josephine Daskam Bacon, as she prefers to be called now. It is evident that her own two little daughters have not handicapped her powers of observation, and her children are always so human, so different from the machine-made, child-studied little automata, that those who have not already met Caroline will not regret their introduction to that young miss. Clara Laughlin, whose "Felicity" was pronounced the best novel of stage life that had yet appeared, will offer something entirely different. "Just Folks" belong to that stratum of society one degree above the submerged, tenement dwellers not without ambition but handicapped by conditions too powerful for their limited knowledge to circumvent. E. V. Lucas, Mabel Osgood Wright, Charles Major, Zona Gale, S. R. Crockett and Stephen Reynolds also appear in their list. Though Jacob I. Riis's "Hero Tales of the Far North" is listed amongst the juveniles, the stories which have already seen light in a monthly periodical are proof that the book will not be after the usual manner of juveniles, a diluted wash of platitudinous obviousities, but stirring narratives of genuine interest. There will be a new edition of "The Book of Christmas," the best thing of its kind yet put forth, and a "Book of Friendship," on somewhat the same lines. Little, Brown and Co. offer a new Susan Clegg book. Susan, with her friend, Mrs. Lathrop who never manages to utter a second word, her comments on the affairs of her neighbors and her experience with a man in the house, should be well known to the reading world by this time. "Flamstead Quarries" is by the author of "The Wood Carver of 'Lympus," Mary E. Waller, a sufficient introduction. E. Phillips Oppenheim is ready again with "The Lost Ambassador." Some one was recently responsible for identifying him with another of the most prolific producers, Anthony Partridge, though both of them must keep eternally at it day and night to write as many novels as they do over their own names. George Wharton James promises "Heroes of California," beginning with the scouts and trappers who first found their way across the Rocky Mountains, continuing with the Mission Fathers and the Pioneers and bringing up with the developers of great enterprises. He has also in hand "The Grand Canyon of Arizona." Little, Brown and Co. share with Lothrop, Lee and Shepard in the publication of juveniles, and their list for 1910 is long. In the Scribner list are Maurice Hewlett's "Rest Harrow," which has appeared serially in the monthly; "Open Water," by James B. Connolly, which, if it comes within a long sea-mile of being as good as his other stories of the Gloucester fishing fleet, will be more than good; "Mr. Dooley Says," which needs no comment; a novel by A. E. W. Mason, author of "The Broken Road" and "Four Feathers"; one by John Galsworthy, one by A. T. Quiller Couch, Ralph D. Payne and Alice Duer Miller, besides a long list of imported books. The Century Company makes special mention of "The Creators," by May Sinclair and a volume of short mystery tales by Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, who is now well along in his eighty-second year.

English Literary Pensions

The latest list of English civil service pensioners includes the names of Richard Whiting for one hundred pounds yearly as a reward for his book, "No. 5 John Street"; Arthur Granville Bradley, eighty pounds, in consideration of his valuable contributions to the known history of Canada; Mrs. Constance Garnett, seventy pounds, for her excellent translations from the Russian, and Mrs. Ellen Beardsley, fifty-five pounds, because she was Aubrey Beardsley's mother. This last has a Chinese flavor, for it is the pleasant custom of those benighted heathen to honor the parents who have given great offsprings to the world rather than the children who have accomplished the feats, the reasoning being that without the care of the parents and the hereditary impulse nothing would have been achieved. Every time there are new additions made to the civil pension list the speculation arises anew as to what the underlying motive of the award has been, and often the commissioners are hard pressed to devise some plausible excuse. The truth appears to be that it is a genteel form of "out-door relief" for those fortunate enough to possess the necessary influence and the rest of it is only a polite way of disguising charity.

Always look for the name George Mayerle on the bottle. Insist on getting Mayerle's.

Costly Improvements

Thousand Oaks is a high class residence section. Its natural beauty is unsurpassed by any home district in the State; it has location and view. Every home-site is individual, the sloping land with its aged oaks and moss covered rocks offers unique building sites.

The splendid improvements now going in are in keeping with the class of the property: oiled macadam pavements, with oiled subgrade; heavy cement curbs, gutters and sidewalks, parks and parkways. Much of this work is already done and large forces of men are still at work, rushing the costly improvements to completion. The curving roads laid out to follow the contour of the land add much to the beauty of Thousand Oaks.

The Southern Pacific recognizes the future of Thousand Oaks for it is spending $3,000,000 in extending and electrifying its lines to give good service to this new section of Berkeley. By early spring the loop system will be in operation with trains each way to San Francisco by three different loops. Their Union station will be only two blocks from the entrance to Thousand Oaks.

Consider the location of this magnificent property—1½ miles from the University—the same distance as Claremont; its splendid improvements and transportation; its native beauty. Then remember that it sells now—before the trains start running—for $25 to $35 a front foot, on terms of 10 per cent down and 1 per cent a month.

This property is an excellent investment as well as an ideal place to build a home.

Come and see Thousand Oaks at once. You can run out in your machine or call at our Berkeley office and we will take you out. Once see this beautiful residence park and you will want to live here.

Preoccupied With the Octopus

Our esteemed contemporary, the Chronicle, one of the most consistently loyal of Republican journals, has been communicating a few shrewd hints to the Hon. Hiram Johnson. The Chronicle realizes that Mr. Johnson is in a most embarrassing position, standing as he is on a platform "that is somewhat high Bryanized for a simon-pure Republican document." According to our contemporary when a man is a candidate for office on a local platform that threatens to carry him to destruction it is his privilege to switch over to the national platform of his party. Naively the Chronicle suggests that possibly this is what Mr. Johnson will do. But the Chronicle is not disposed to rush the gentleman. It says: "Just now, of course, he is busy with crushing out what glimmer of life may remain in the octopus." But suppose Mr. Johnson keeps on concentrating all his efforts on the Herculean and spectacular job of slaying the unpopular monster—what then? Will the Chronicle appeal to Republican voters in his behalf? There seems to be an answer to this question in the final period of the Chronicle editorial: "When that is done (the crushing out of the ultimate glimmer) the time may come when Mr. Johnson will make it clear that the Republican party, in electing him, will not be faithless to its time-honored principles." In other words, if we may be permitted to construe this subtle utterance, Mr. Johnson must abandon the Bryanized platform or lose the support of all the conscientious Republican voters in California, including the editor of the Chronicle. Assuredly the Chronicle will not support a candidate for Governor who neglects to affirm his fidelity to time-honored Republican principles. So obviously it behooves Mr. Johnson to give the octopus the fatal squeeze before November.

Our Bottle-Tight Town

Since Charles Schwab left town the Chinese navy which we were told was to be built at the Union Iron Works seems to have dropped into the limbo of forgotten things. The conviction pervades newspaper circles that the less said about that navy the better. Our labor unions are very much averse to having public attention called to the fact that they have almost completely ruined the business of the largest manufacturing plant in California, and our newspapers are extremely sensitive to union labor sentiment. So the dailies aren't saying anything about the navy or about the Union Iron Works. They know that if the shipbuilding trust should get the contract to build a navy for China not a single vessel would be built in San Francisco. And they know the reason why. They know that organized labor has San Francisco by the throat, that organized labor is crushing the life out of our industries and giving tremendous impetus to business elsewhere at our expense; yet they studiously ignore this portentous situation from fear of giving offense to the unions. This is a curious state of affairs without parallel in the United States. The most important of all the problems now affecting the vital interests of the city is this problem of the disadvantage from which our industries suffer owing to the fact that they are not permitted to employ labor on the terms that obtain in other cities. This problem is occasionally the subject of academic discussion in civic bodies, but never in our newspapers. By the organs of public opinion it is regarded with almost as much horror as the average person regards the bubonic plague. These great, untrammelled palladiums of our liberties, how cautiously do they abstain from saying aught that might incur the disfavor of organized labor! Censors of human conduct on all levels, the argus-eyed press discerns the minutest of delinquencies everywhere but in its own frail house of glass. Suppression of the truth is worse than the perversion of it; for when there is perversion there may be controversy, and by controversy is truth established. Here in San Francisco the most vital of all problems is never the subject of controversy. Hence there is no prospect of its being solved. We never hear of the problem except when there is a strike, and when there is a strike the news is most carefully censored. San Francisco is indeed a bottle-tight labor town.

Our Greatest Benefactor

It has been said that there is no greater pleasure than that which comes from doing a good action by stealth and having it found out by accident. There can be no objection to the taking of this sort of pleasure; but if all philanthropists were of the surreptitious variety there would be danger of many of them going without the reward of public esteem. Because of this danger the Hearst method of doing good and trumpeting his benefactions so that all the world may know of them meets with our unqualified approval. Were it not for Mr. Hearst's candid and generous acknowledgment of his incessant perseverance in doing good he would not be appreciated at his true worth. Were it not his paramount policy to remind us from time to time of his patriotic gratuities we should frequently be unaware of our prodigious debts of gratitude, and Mr. Hearst might be bankrupted by his benevolence. We have no patience with those philosophers who hold that he who receives a benefit should never forget it and he who bestows should never remember. How can one be mindful of something that one has no knowledge of? If Mr. Hearst hadn't taken the world into his confidence would the Democracy have known that he carried Maine for the party? Or, if had he remained silent, would the people have known that to his foresight and influence we must attribute the privilege that we now enjoy of fortifying the Panama Canal? Mr. Hearst is the nation's greatest benefactor. From his own unimpeachable testimony we have learned from time to time of the priceless boons that he has bestowed on the people of this great nation. Without him our navy would now consist of a few leaky tubs. He has defended us against rapacious corporations, preserved us against unwholesome food, immoral literature and a thousand bugaboos. He was the original Nemesis of the boll weevil; he organized the first campaign against the white fly that preys on the Florida orange; he was the first patriot to inveigh against the gypsy moth that sucks apples in New England; he was the first guardian of the public weal to get on the trail of the ravenous thrip that pesters the prune grower of the Santa Clara Valley; in him the tobacco worm of Maryland and the Tammany politician of New York recognize their most powerful enemy. In short Mr. Hearst is the one and only viaticum that helps us along the journey of life. In history he will be regarded as one of those divine messengers through whom the spirit of God works on the human mass. But of all this we should be deplorably ignorant if the great journalist acted on the false and foolish principle that it is in acting well one's part all honor lies. So let us be grateful to Mr. Hearst not only for the good that he does but for the publicity that he gives to his benefactions.

Credit Where Credit is Due

Not for the purpose of discrediting one of Mr. Hearst's claims on our gratitude, but that honor may be justly distributed we venture to add a few words to what he has said about the history of the Panama Canal treaty. We fear that inadvertently, probably because he relied too much on memory, in his review of what occurred prior to the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty he wandered somewhat from the truth, the result being that Theodore Roosevelt's attitude on the main question involved in the dispute has not been accurately described. In the course of his public career Mr. Roosevelt has received much credit to which he is not entitled, but this is not a good and sufficient reason for denying him that which he has earned. And while we sincerely hope that the evil he has done will be neither interred with his bones nor always sequestered from public view during his life, we are far from disposed to acquiesce in the perversion of that small portion of his record which entitles him to acclaim. Mr. Hearst says (and of this there is no dispute) that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 between England and the United States contemplated the construction of the canal under the joint auspices of the two governments to be controlled by them jointly, its neutrality and security to be guaranteed by both. Mr. Hearst adds and with equal truth that if the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty had been ratified at Washington the canal would have been neutralized, not American in the full sense of the word. But when he says that Mr. Roosevelt was not opposed to the neutralization of the canal he is guilty of misrepresentation. When the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under discussion the New York Sun called attention to the fact that if it were adopted the canal would become an international highway, and that while we should have paid every dollar of the cost our management of it would be in the capacity of agent of the maritime nations. The Sun vigorously opposed the treaty. That was eleven years ago. Colonel Roosevelt was then Governor of New York. One day he dictated for the Sun the following paragraph:

"I most earnestly hope that the pending treaty concerning the Isthmian Canal will not be ratified unless amended so as to provide that the canal when built shall be wholly under the con-of the United States, alike in peace and war. This seems to me vital, no less from the standpoint of the Monroe Doctrine."

So it is evident that Mr. Roosevelt was not unconscious of the importance of rejecting or amending the treaty. The treaty was amended, eliminating entirely the idea of a joint control. The United States made itself responsible for the neutrality of the canal and thus became sole judge of what constitutes an infraction of the canal's neutrality. British journals are now saying that the treaty does not empower us to fortify the canal, but the fact is that from this treaty was omitted a clause which explicitly prohibited fortifications commanding the canal or the waters adjacent. The Senate ratified the treaty on the distinct assurance by the Committee on Foreign Relations that the omission of the clause left this country free to fortify whenever fortifications should be deemed desirable. This treaty was signed by Mr. Roosevelt after its ratification by the Senate.

The Invaluable Sense of Humor

Life, we are told, would be endurable were it not for its pleasures. The author of this cynical epigram doubtless regarded all pleasures as the forerunners of pain. Many of the old dry-as-dust philosophers affected a lofty scorn of the pleasures of life. They tell us that in pleasure are sown the seeds of repentance from which spring a harvest of suffering, and that it is impossible to give ourselves up to pleasure without palling the faculty of enjoyment. All of which may be true enough; but of course these philosophic reflections apply only to those worldly and sensual pleasures that revenge the jolly madness of an hour; not to the intellectual pleasures that never cloy, that add to the tranquillity of life. Not to all of us, however, are the intellectual pleasures of life accessible. To their enjoyment are essential certain senses with which all men are not endowed. The sense of beauty is one of them, perhaps the rarest; the sense of humor is another. Equipped with either a man can get out of life a great deal of pleasure that cannot be bought with gold. Of these two senses that of humor is the more valuable. This sense enables one to see the absurdity of grieving over the consequences of pleasure. "I mingled my wines unwisely last night, and I am ill," says the man without a sense of humor in a sad, repentant mood. But what says the man with a sense of humor? He laughs at his folly and observes that he can realize a time when he shall be well. "And, please the gods," he adds, "I'll get full again." The sense of humor mitigates the pains of physical infirmities, assuages the melancholy of adverse fortune, induces the philosophic calm which is proof against all kinds of mental irritation; in short it is the next best thing to an abiding faith in providence. For those who are without this sense life is a serious business to be pursued with trepidation. They are easily vexed, annoyed when they should be amused, enraged when they should be splitting their sides with laughter. It is the man without a sense of humor who entangles himself in family quarrels and political feuds. The bitter partisan, the slave of faction, the religious bigot, the zealot of reform, the creature of temperament and sympathy—all these are men without a sense of humor. It is because there is so little of this delightful sense among men that governments are demoralized by politics, by what Abraham Lincoln called "the incessant human wriggle and struggle for office." It is always with profound seriousness that we take our politicians, those job-chasing knaves who would circumvent God as Shakespeare tells us. And because we take them seriously instead of laughing at them our politics gets on our nerves, deranges digestion and dislocates business. How much better would it be did we realize that "the man who can make two ears of corn or two blades of grass grow on the spot where only one grew before would deserve better of mankind and render more essential service to the country than the whole race of politicians put together." But this we do not realize because we have not that philosophic calm that comes from a well developed sense of humor. If this sense which protects man from humbug as well as ennui were denied to none but politicians the game of politics would be an inexhaustible source of enjoyment to all the rest of us. As it is, the most ludicrous of all earthly performances instead of provoking us to laughter rouses in us the most enervating of emotions. Given a screaming farce abounding in episodes of the utmost comicality, we sit through it in a mood such as is induced in sensible men only by soul-racking tragedy. We permit our feelings to be harrowed and tortured, our passions inflamed and tormented. Take for example the current national extravaganza of the insurgents against the regulars, wherein is satirized with the most exquisite humor the professions of certain professional patriots. A fair specimen of the quality of the whole is to be found in the act dealing with the contest in New York. Here the motives, the characters, the business, have the quality of universality. Wherever the game of politics is being played in this country the elements of the farce are identical with those in the New York performance. Here we have what solemnly purports to be a conflict between the defenders of the people and the manipulators of a political machine. Among the gallant defenders is Fred Greiner, a typical serio-comic artist, formerly a lieutenant and disciple of the late Thomas C. Platt, a performer skilled in all the stratagems, faithful to all the principles of the sordid, professional politician. A sub-boss for years, once enjoying the distinction of a criminal indictment, Mr. Greiner is now the henchman of Theodore Roosevelt striving to purify the politics of his native State. Next in importance comes George W. Dunn, chairman of the Republican State Committee, concerning whom some interesting testimony was given at Albany last winter when the campaign contributions made by corporations interested in certain legislative measures were the subject of investigation. Colonel Dunn is now a shrieking reformer. Associated with Dunn and Greiner is the Hon. J. Sloat Fassett, boss of Elmira, once a lieutenant of Platt's, a supporter and confidential agent of Cannon in Washington but an insurgent in New York. And now directing the activities of these bosslets in the interest of the dear people is Theodore Roosevelt, once a protege of the Hon. Thomas C. Platt, and so warm an admirer of the late Matt Quay that even as President of the United States he did not hesitate to deliver a eulogy on the Pennsylvania boss at the time of that gentleman's death, holding him up as an example worthy of the admiration of the youth of America. It would seem that merely to mention the names of the eminent protagonists of this, the genuine American drama, in connection with a statement of the scenario would be sufficient to excite the risibles of all the people and convulse them with laughter. Yet the fact is that the people have been watching developments with absolutely sober faces, with feelings such as ordinarily are excited only by dramas that tug at the heart strings. To the humor of the business they are wholly insensible. The only reason, we suppose, that the solemnity of the audience doesn't strike us as pathetic is that a saving sense of humor intervenes.

Perspective Impressions

Practice the art of expressing your troubles in terms of silence.

We are constantly being reminded that the paradoxes of today are the platitudes of tomorrow.

According to the Examiner half a million dollars of city money has faded away in the Bureau of Engineering, and it has been necessary to employ outside architects to design school buildings because of the demoralization of the Bureau of Architecture. All of which argues the advisability of plunging deeper into municipal ownership.

The need of the hour:—A little more business and a little less politics.

"The progressives have come to constitute about three-fourths of the voting population of the United States," says William R. Hearst. He has been taking a snap tally.

"School children were again the striking part of Johnson's audience when he spoke in Moke-lumne Hill."—Examiner. Is it not as bad to feed the little ones on undiluted humbug as on doctored milk?

With the Federal push behind him Colonel Roosevelt routed the old guard. The beating of a machine with a machine is a popular victory when the beating is done by the people's friend.

Colonel Roosevelt's victory was the logical result of his previous achievement in the role of president-maker. Mr. Taft as Roosevelt's heir has shown his gratitude by turning a State machine over to his benefactor. And the complaisant public views this traffic in power without the faintest murmur of disapproval. Thus we see in the evolution of national character that human nature through the centuries remains absolutely true to itself.

At a Dance

My queen is tired and craves surcease
Of twanging string and clamorous brass;
I lean against the mantlepiece,
And watch her in the glass.

One whom I see not where I stand
Fans her and talks in whispers low;
Her loose locks flutter as his hand
Moves lightly to and fro.

He begs a flower; her finger-tips
Stray round a rose half veiled in lace;
She grants the boon with smiling lips,
Her clear eyes read his face.

I cannot look, my sight grows dim—
While Fate allots unequally,
The living woman's self to him,
The mirrored form to me.

—Augusta de Gruchy.

A "Sun-Harbored" Poet

Concerning the Subtle Method and Craftsmanlike Output of a Southland Bard Who Sings Mellifluously of "Souls" and "Tholes," "Scent of Lemons" and "World-Wearied Trails," and Ships That "Beckon to the Main"

By Democritus

I have found a poet in the Southland; a motley poet who woos the muse in dithyrambs of prose and in fair flowing verse as to quantity, accent and assonance. My poet's name is McGroarty, John S. McGroarty, and he has written a lyric on "The Bay of San Diego" in the first stanza of which he tells us that "the sunlight of the morning across the far hills broke"; and that "from the dawn the veils of mist fell and faded" as he woke; that "the sea was bathed with glory in a sweep of swirling fire," and that he "wandered with his soul in the Land of Heart's Desire." If this isn't poetry, what is it?

In his second stanza Poet McGroarty is not only "in the Land of Heart's Desire," but he is also "in the dreamland of his soul" where his "boat is on the shore with its rudder and its thole, with its white sails agleam and the soft winds blowing free, and the Bay of San Diego shining blue against the sea." Note that Poet McGroarty's boat is a combination sail and row boat—that it has a rudder and a thole and "white sails agleam." This indicates that Poet McGroarty knows his local maritime conditions. Even the motor boats of San Diego Bay are provided with tholes and sails—and the thole is the chief reliance when the gasoline engine slips its cogs or ceases to spark or the carbureter goes askew, for even "sails agleam" are useless when the "soft winds" are not "blowing free," which frequently happens in a bay and climate where the average wind velocity is only four miles an hour and all the days are "peace and slumberous calm." Note also that Poet McGroarty's boat has only one thole to rime with "soul." If he had furnished his boat with the usual complement of tholes it would have been imperative that his "dreamland" should have more than one soul. Something had to be sacrificed, for even a poet cannot have a plurality of souls, so Poet McGroarty reduced the number of his boat pins and to prevent lop-sided navigation in rowing took care to mention that his craft had a rudder. It is seldom that a poet fetters his fancy with such minute accuracy of details. Furthermore it is worthy of remark that nothing in the tackle, hamper or accoutrement of a small bay craft rimes with "soul" except "thole." No doubt Poet McGroarty tried everything in a cat-boat's equipment, from the flying jib to the rudder-post, before he hit upon that word "thole" to fit the prosodical requirements of his "soul."

The gem of purest ray serene in this poem by Poet McGroarty is as follows:

"The lemon was in blossom, and, shimmered in between,
Glowed the gold of the orange and the olive's flash of green;
I could see them from the waters that rippled, blue and bright,
On the Bay of San Diego in the golden morning light."

I am sure that if Goethe could have read this perfect quatrain by Poet McGroarty before he wrote his immortal Wilhelm Meister, he would have refrained from such slavish imitation as this:

"Know'st thou the land where the lemon-trees bloom,
Where the gold orange glows in the deep thicket's gloom,
Where a wind ever soft from the blue heaven blows,
And the groves are of laurel and myrtle and rose."

In the matter of rime and reason, Poet McGroarty is as untrammelled as his "soft winds blowing free." Nothing stands in his way when the exigencies of his verse require prompt and effective action. He looks out to "the billows" far horizon" and he sees "a white ship sail" leaving the reader in "modest doubt," which is called "the beacon of the wise," as to whether his ship or its sail is white. If that isn't high art, pray tell me what it is. Then landward he gazed, and "backward o'er the hills stretched the world-wearied trail." Observe the strong, Homeric compound, "world-wearied." It is not every modern poet that is capable of such virile invention as "trails world-wearied." But the ship lured him not "that beckoned to the main,"

"And the trail was not for me, though with gold it were lain."

What is a transitive verb to Poet McGroarty? Or what is Poet McGroarty to an intransitive verb? No more than Hecuba to Hamlet or Hamlet to Hecuba. Since Poet McGroarty's ship could not lure him, though it "beckoned to the main," it was impossible that a "world-wearied trail" could tempt him "though with gold it were lain," and I don't believe the trail could have seduced him even if it were as "thick inlaid with patines of bright gold" as "the floor of heaven" itself. And it must have been Poet Joaquin Miller's "Ship of the Desert" that "beckoned to the main," or one of those ancient pirate craft that "sailed the Spanish main."

I have not quoted Poet McGroarty's poem in its entirety because I wish to leave some of it to the imagination of the reader. I feel that so much is due the lovers of genuine poesy. But I cannot resist the temptation to give my fellow admirers of exquisite verse one more excerpt from the song of this wonderful singer of the Southland:

"From the hills blew the blithe breeze of morn,
The scent of the lemon on its breath of lotus borne,
The scent of the lemon from the mesas blowing down,
From Chula Vista's mesas to the sun-harbored town."

Can't you smell the lemon on its breath of lotus borne? Can't you actually see the "sun-harbored town" which is little old San Diego, where they are going to hold a great exposition in 1915, which will be "opened" no doubt, on January 1, with another poem by Poet McGroarty and closed at the end of the year with an ode or an epic by the same singer. Great things are surely in store for the "sun-harbored town" if Poet McGroarty's muse doesn't fall sea sick on Poet McGroarty's single-thole boat or if his Pegasus doesn't "lay" down on that "world-wearied trail." San Diego Bay is known from Rabbit Peak to Tia Juana, from Point San Mateo to Calexico, as "the harbor of the sun" because Poet McGroarty has so named it; and it is the logic of McGroarty poesy that San Diego should be "the sun-harbored town," whatever may be the objection of mere prosodists, mud-witted etymologists and pedantic syntaxers.

The Eva Swan Case

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: The newspapers are once more "reveling" (as the reporters say) in an ideal newspaper sensation. This Swan case has supplied them with an effective stimulus to cant and hysteria, and the reporters have made us dizzy with their superlatives. This case it must be admitted has several dramatic features, but from one viewpoint it is of a most commonplace character. Had the Coroner learned of the death of Eva Swan immediately after that event it would not have excited much interest. The circumstances of her death were not peculiar. Operations such as the one performed on Eva Swan are performed every day, and deaths from them are by no means rare. The reporters tell us that it was an atrocious murder. Now technically speaking the crime is manslaughter, and for this crime men are not hanged. It cannot properly be described as atrocious because it is neither wantonly wicked nor extremely heinous. It may be committed to shield a woman from disgrace, and when such is the motive a charitable view may be taken of it. Of course this was not the motive in the Swan case so far as Dr. Grant or Thompson is concerned. But it was the motive of his victim in having an illegal operation performed on herself. Nothing can be said in extenuation of the doctor's crime. Evidently he is a pretty tough character, cold-blooded enough to commit an atrocious murder, and he cuts a repulsive figure in the case from whatever standpoint we view him, but more particularly by reason of the elements that entered into the case subsequent to the sad death of his unfortunate victim. It is to be hoped that he will be punished. But the point that I wish to make is that this case has brought to light certain phases of human conduct that have been overlooked and that are in themselves as painful to observe as those on which the newspapers have exclusively dwelt. The treatment to which the nurse, Marie Messerschmidt, has been subjected, is to me as revolting as the cutting up of Eva Swan's body. To me it seems that this poor woman, the passive accomplice of Dr. Grant in his grewsome efforts to conceal the evidences of his crime, is to be pitied in her hour of shame and humiliation. We are told that she is lacking in tenderness. Reporters, I have noticed, have a habit of taking as an infallible basis for their analysis of character the circumstances in which the person judged has been placed. From the circumstances of a particular episode they draw all their psychological conclusions, and never fail to adapt them to their purpose which is always to discredit the person accused of crime. The reporter is so accustomed to human misery that he is unconsciously callous—more so as a rule than the unfortunates who come under his observation. Nor is this callousness confined to the male reporter, as one may perceive by reading certain interviews with Marie Messerschmidt written by one of the skirted sex.

Among the phases of human conduct to which I have alluded is that which has been revealed by the attitude of the reporters toward young Parker whom they suspect of having been the cause of Eva Swan's condition, and of having advised the operation from which she died. From the standpoint of strict morality it is very reprehensible for a young man to have such relations with a young woman as young Parker is supposed to have had with Eva Swan, and if as a result of such relations the young woman finds herself in an embarrassing condition it is wrong according to the modern code of morality for the young man to do anything but marry her, but are our virtuous young reporters fully qualified to throw bricks at Parker? Are they really shocked at his conduct, or are they guilty of something worse than they impute to him—sickening hypocrisy.

Two Wise Men

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Some time ago I read in Town Talk that it's a fine thing to be an editor because of the self-satisfaction that an editor has in making arguments for straw men and demolishing them. I have frequently been reminded of this observation by the queer arguments of some of our local editors whose oracularity is a sure cure for the megrims. For a specimen of this sort of thing read your brilliant contemporary, the Call, of last Tuesday. Therein you will see how absurd it is to suspect Roosevelt of Caesarian tendencies. "If Roosevelt," says the Call, "wanted to play Caesar and make himself a despot he would not have so decisively refused to be a candidate for a third term." Now there you are. Presumably that settles it. There's nothing further to be said on the subject. But singularly enough there are some people who regard Roosevelt's refusal to be a candidate for a third term of no significance whatever. In their judgment he shrewdly considered it advisable not to make the play for a third term while he was in office. Notwithstanding his great popularity at that time if he had ignored one of the most sacred traditions of his country public sentiment might have undergone a great change. Who knows but that he realized that if he became a candidate it would be at the risk of his popularity. Mr. Roosevelt knows something of the history of his country, and Mr. Roosevelt is not taking any chances with his popularity. But aside from all this, it may be argued, why should the affected abnegation of a statesman be considered conclusive of unselfishness. Is not this affectation peculiarly Caesarian? Did not Napoleon pretend to be averse to becoming First Consul for life? These are the suggestions of persons with whom the Call's editor would not deign to argue. This superior person appreciates only the sound logic of editors of his own mental calibre. Hence we find him quoting approvingly the Cleveland Leader which slaughters whole armies of straw men every day. The Cleveland Leader tells us that Roosevelt is suspected of Caesarism because, forsooth, he peppers his speeches with the pronoun "I." Assuming this to be the case of course the suspicion is absurd. Besides "It is inconceivable that he would be able to achieve the end and keep the people in ignorance of his intention." Here we have the apprehensions of the unwise exploded in a masterly fashion. These apprehensions, it appears, were not due to the gradual evolution of Teddy's policies into the New Nationalism, the adumbration of which some men perceived years ago. His contempt for the Constitution, his advocacy of a strong central government embodied in an omniscient Executive, his hostility to courts that are inspired by principles rather than expediency—these are not the things that made men apprehensive. The pronoun "I" is wholly responsible for a mischievous misconception. And even though we were justified in suspecting Teddy, we should know that he is harmless because the people cannot be kept in ignorance. This is the first time I ever knew it was essential to the purpose of a statesman with Caesarian tendencies to keep the people in ignorance. I have supposed that the usual way is capture the imagination of the people as Caesar did and as Napoleon did and to educate them up to the idea that what they need is a strong central government in the hands of the great hero of the moment. I am glad to have been set right by two great editors whose intelligence is something to marvel at.

Kowalsky's Memoirs, of Course!

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I read with interest but not with approval your editorial in the current issue entitled "History for the Prurient." With the sentiments which you have expressed I find myself unable to agree. Don't you know that history is a parcel of lies which the industrious grubbers among mendacious state papers, official correspondences and bills of mortality are forever unwrapping only to wrap it up again in different shape and with a different piece of string? That being so why should we not throw it overboard and content ourselves with investigating the achievements of the great in the "sweet business of love"? The sexual impulse is the mainspring of human action—break it and the organism ticks no more. We have our great men today but they are only interesting when romance empurples their lives. Which would you prefer to read, the memoirs of Colonel Kowalsky or the autobiography of Professor Boke?

San Francisco, September 24.

Sincerely,

—M. Petit Maitre.

Dislikes "Journalese"

Editor, Town Talk, Sir: I apply to you as a judge in the court of letters for an injunction restraining the police reporters of the local papers from doing further violence to the English language. Will you kindly summon them to show cause why they should not be restrained from using vile phrases like "saw-hacked body" and "acid-filled grave"? I object to being told that the prisoner was "marched in manacles," that he was a "Dartmouth graduate and monster" and that he managed to keep "a semblance of a repressed countenance." (If this is a deadly weapon why don't the police take it away from him?) Why can't a murder case be reported in simple language like a meeting of an improvement club? When you sit in this case kindly make the injunction perpetual and oblige,

The King's Clothes

By Koloman Mikszath (From the Hungarian)

Even chroniclers do not always agree.

When they recorded the history of King Maurus, they neglected to state what land he ruled. That, however, need have no material effect upon your opinion of the story. Who believes, believes. Here is the story as it stands written:

One afternoon King Maurus was making great haste to get through with the wearisome business of empire; which means that he hastily signed seventy documents, whose contents the minister had read to him in a sing-song voice. His Majesty was stretched out at ease, with closed eyes, listening as calmly as possible to the unavowable recital. There were numerous appointments, some death-warrants, and various other trifles; and his majesty yawned vigorously over each.

"We have finished," at length said the minister, while he tucked the bulky volume of papers under his arm and stuck the seal of state in his waistcoat pocket.

"Wait a moment, Narzis," said the king. "Take the seal out of your pocket and stamp this blank death-warrant, that I may sign it."

"A blank death-warrant, your Majesty!" stammered the minister.

"Well, have you anything to say against my wishes? You probably know that you are my minister and that it is not your business to know why you affix the seal. Narzis, Narzis, you are getting childish!"

"Oh, oh, your Majesty, what nonsense is this! I am the faithful servant of the best of kings."

Maurus tapped old Narzis indulgently on the shoulder, then took the desired document and hid it in an inner pocket of his clothes, which were of cloth of gold.

"Now, old man, I feel equal to anything. By heaven, it is mine, and I don't mind telling you the use I intend putting it to."

"Most glorious of kings!" murmured Narzis.

"It is my wish to win the favor of a very beautiful woman. It was she who asked me for this trifle. Of course, you see, I couldn't refuse her such a little thing."

"Your Majesty is pleased to be gracious!"

"I am wise, far-sighted, Narzis! You see, the trouble is, the beautiful woman has a husband, but not the power to get rid of him. I give her the power, and she frees herself. Hu-s-h! Narzis!—that is, I think, perhaps, she will."

"It is sweeter to kiss than to kill," insinuated Narzis.

"True it is, old man. I shall take her this document at once, for the favor of the king is a seed that bears good fruit. Write that down in the golden book of my wisdom. Did you write down what I said yesterday about the increase in taxes?"

"Yes, your Majesty."

"Let me hear how it sounds."

The minister opened the golden book and read: "A good king is like a gardener who fells many trees."

"That sounds very well," said the king in a satisfied tone, straightening his crown the while and making ready to betake himself to his closed garden by the shore of the sacred Nile.

The servants and courtiers whom he met by the way salaamed to the ground, exclaiming: "Greeting to the great King Maurus!" His gleaming garments of gold dazzled the eye, and it seemed to him that the very earth trembled when he walked.

The nightingale in the garden began to sing of love as if she guessed the king's thoughts, the lilies bowed before him, the roses strewed their petals in his path and the azalea softly whispered a name, but not that of the great King Maurus—instead, that of Florilla, the beautiful woman, the wife of Rogus, the son of Narzis. It was to her side the king was hastening. The retainers within the palace, meanwhile, were wondering whither the king was going in such haste.

"The king bears someone's head with him," the minister made bold to whisper to his son.

Rogus, then, in sudden fear, thought of his own head and swiftly spoke to the man who watched the gate. "Here is a purse of gold," he said. "Exchange clothing with me and let me enter the garden."

The watchman shook his head. "I dare not," he replied. "The king would make me pay for it with my head when he comes back."

"You are an ass," said Rogus. "The king cannot kill you until he comes back, while I will kill you now if you do not obey; so you see you have a chance to gain time and a purse of gold in the bargain."

The watchman quickly saw the advantage, and the suspicious Rogus slipped into the garden and followed the footsteps of the king.

Before him, too, the lilies bowed, roses strewed their brightest petals and the azalea whispered—Florilla.

A secret door, to which King Maurus possessed the key, led from the garden to the shore of the Nile, by whose side were gleaming villas made for pleasure and for love. Among them was the villa of Rogus, which the king had given to him the summer before in reward for his bravery. At the time of the gift the minister had written in the golden book: "The favor of the king is like a rich harvest."

Rogus kept stealthily following the king. Deep silence reigned on the shore of the Nile, save for the soft ripple of the water. The bright glow in the evening sky colored it steel-blue, and the shimmering river resembled the blade of a gigantic sword.

When the king came to the dwelling of Rogus, he whistled thrice upon a silver whistle. At this signal a woman appeared upon the balcony. Of her I have only this to say, that the artists of former ages have preserved for the modern world no more beautiful head. There was a certain glory about her face and form. As she leaned down from the balcony in the twilight her luxuriant blond hair shone like the Milky Way.

"Is it you, Florilla?" whispered the king.

Rogus, concealed behind the shrubbery, listened with quick-beating heart to what was about to follow. He knew what it would be, for he had suspected her for a long time.

"It is I, my king, it is I," answered the flute-like voice of Florilla.

"May I come up, my love?"

"Why ask? It is a king's prerogative to command."

"I have given your husband court business to attend to, so that he cannot surprise us, and if it is your wish, he will never come back again. Florilla, here is the death-warrant."

"With the seal of the minister?"

"Certainly."

"That's evil enough of my father," thought Rogus.

"Bring it up to me in an hour," whispered Florilla.

A full hour is a long time for a king to wait, especially when he is in love. It was an evening of tropic heat, relieved by no breath of cooling wind. The Nile was like a mirror. A little bee swam upon a withered flower-petal without suffering shipwreck.

A long time the king sat watching the treacherous water, until a wish rose in his heart, and what a king wishes—! Straightway he seated himself upon the bank by a bit of shrubbery in whose neighborhood Rogus was concealed—a thousand conflicting plans in his mind—and took from his feet the yellow boots with their golden spurs, laid aside the purple mantle and the orange-colored, diamond-studded vest, took the little silver whistle from his neck and disrobed, leaving his costly garments upon the ground.

The mighty ruler looked around. No one was to be seen. Who, indeed, would dare venture upon the sacred Nile's forbidden shore?

Only the mirroring waters were shameless enough to reflect his royal person. Maurus leaped gladly into the Nile, which swept him softly along, caressing his limbs the while. It was glorious—glorious! The vines upon the trees by the bank formed a fragrant wall, and shining pebbles tickled his feet. When he had bathed enough and the trysting hour was at hand, he left the water to dress and hastened, trembling, to the place where he had left his clothing.

He must have missed the shrub where he left it, so he hastened on. Again he had made a mistake. There, too, nothing of the royal garments was to be seen. Shivering with fear, he ran from place to place.

"Where are my clothes? Who has stolen them?" he cried. "It cannot be a man. Listen, Earth; if you have swallowed them, I will tear up all the grass and trees in my realm!"

He threw himself upon the ground and sobbed bitterly.

Then he jumped up and angrily threatened the moon.

"Shine better, you miserable night lamp, or I will destroy your temple."

But the moon didn't seem inclined to obey; she acted like a bashful maiden, and covered her face with a veil of clouds.

Rain began to fall, and water dripping from dust-laden trees disfigured his face.

In despair he made up his mind to return to the palace and clothe himself afresh. It was a great disgrace for the courtiers and retainers to see him in such a plight. But he soon thought of a remedy for that: he would behead them all, so that no one should betray him. Vain hope. The door was closed, and yet he remembered having hidden the key!

There was nothing to do now but to circle the city and enter by the south gate and then make his way through numberless streets to the palace.

He must hasten, for it would soon be day. What scornful songs would his subjects not write could they see him in this condition.

Luckily no one saw him. The streets through which he ran were empty.

Only a beggar by the name of Dim lay sleeping with a sack under his head by a temple door.

The king waked him. "Give me your covering at once," he said commandingly.

The frightened beggar lifted his crutch and struck him. "Get out, get out, or I'll strike you again."

The king saw he was the weaker and hastened on.

The watchman was dreaming by the gate when someone struck him.

"Who are you and what do you want?"

"Let me in," commanded the king, in a feverish voice, "and give me your mantle."

The watchman took this as a joke and merely made a face. "Is there anything you want? I'm sorry there isn't a madhouse near."

"I command you to obey at once," insisted the king in a rage.

"Get out!" said the soldier, directing his spear toward the miserable figure, whose feet were bleeding and whose hair was wet and disheveled.

"Don't you know me?"

"No."

"I am the king."

"Better say his fool. Clear out! You may be thankful that I am too tired to give you a beating."

King Maurus began to say pleasant things, for

Siftings from Many Sources

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over.

The Richness of the Klondike

The Klondike placer mining district in Alaska has produced $150,000,000 worth of gold since 1898, and mining experts estimate that the amount yet to be mined will equal that already produced. Consul Cole of Dawson reports that the gold output for 1910 will exceed that of 1909, when more than $3,500,000 worth was produced. Most of this gold, he states, was shipped to the United States. A small quantity went to the new Canadian mint. Consul Cole reports that rich deposits of copper ore have been discovered in the southern part of the Klondike district.

Virtue in Delaware

The feminine residents of Wyoming, a town near Dover, and the fruit centre of Delaware, will not allow the pictures of female acrobats in tights to be displayed on billboards. When the advance brigade of a circus struck the place recently every billboard was covered with gaudy lithographs in which figures of female performers, all in tights, were conspicuous. The women of Wyoming, many of them Quakers, were shocked. They appealed in vain to have the display of tights removed, and finally the problem was solved by the more progressive of the objectors who bought large quantities of muslin and literally dressed the figures. The showmen found their posters decorously draped and thought it a good advertisement for their show.

England's Submarines

Very little is heard about Great Britain's submarine fleet, although occasional reports of maneuvers or accidents appear in the newspapers. According to Mr. Charles W. Domville Fife, who is an authority on the submarine navies of the world, Great Britain has been expending large sums of money on submarines for eight or ten years without attracting any public notice, and now possesses a remarkably efficient flotilla, much larger than that possessed by any other nation. He has prepared charts showing the various coast areas defended by these vessels, which occupy stations from Pembroke south to Dover and northward to Dundee. All fear of invasion, he argues, is practically ended by this arrangement, which leaves the battleship fleet free to deliver its attack when it pleases against any foe who may be meditating attack. It seems certain that submarine mining, for purposes of defense, has been largely abandoned in favor of the submarine boat, and such authorities as Admiral Sir John Hopkins and Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge, it is to be noted, are very careful in writing about the submarine to say that the extent of its offensive powers is still uncertain, except when conditions are particularly favorable to its operations.

Roosevelt not Mentioned

Although Denver went wild over Theodore Roosevelt when he visited the city recently the Republican convention of the city and county of Denver adjourned without mentioning Roosevelt's name in its many resolutions. President Taft was warmly commended for his course and accomplishments, and the convention declared itself proud of the record of his administration, but his predecessor was ignored. Senator Guggenheim was highly praised for his work in Congress and his liberal gifts to State institutions. He was as good as named for a second term in the resolutions. Every Republican of national prominence was praised for what he had done except the hunter-statesman. So marked was the omission of his name from the record of deeds well done that some one asked at the conclusion of the reading of the resolutions, "Who assassinated Roosevelt?"

Reciprocity with Canada

The first formal step has been taken toward the negotiation of a reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada. It was largely through the President's personal efforts that the negotiations for a commercial treaty under the maximum and minimum clause of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law were carried to a successful conclusion. While the Canadian officials are in favor of a reciprocity treaty with this country there is strong opposition in many parts of that country. Recently the manufacturing interests in Canada have started a campaign against the proposed trade agreement. At the same time Sir Wilfrid Laurier and other high officials have been delivering speeches in an effort to educate the people to the reciprocity idea. The general impression among United States officials is that the treaty negotiations will be long drawn out. Nobody is optimistic enough to expect that any results will be laid before Congress in the coming short session. President Taft is hopeful that an opening wedge for general reciprocity between the two countries may be driven by an agreement at first on agricultural products.

French Children's Suicide

Five children, boys and girls under age, have committed suicide in France within the last fortnight, and the fact is so striking that it has aroused public attention as to the causes of juvenile self-destruction. One more instance is now reported of the suicide of a boy aged thirteen at a place near Louahns. The lad's father died a few years ago, and his mother, who had a large family, placed him on a farm where he was employed in minding sheep. His employer was quite satisfied with his work, and treated him kindly, but the lad was very sensitive to reproach of any kind. One day the farmer scolded him for a slight fault, whereupon the boy packed up his clothes and whatever he had and walked to the nearest bridge over a river, where he was seen for a long time looking over the parapet. Suddenly he jumped into the stream and was carried away by the current. Several persons who had seen him attempted to rescue him, but they arrived too late. In Russia youthful suicide is also exciting a great deal of consternation.

The Spectator

Bishop Nichols' Mistake

The reception to Prince Hsun, the uncle of the Emperor of China, which was held last week in the ball room of the St. Francis was a gorgeous affair which went off with but a single contretemps. Singularly enough Bishop Nichols was the disturbing factor and those who witnessed the incident laugh every time they think of it. Before the local dignitaries were invited to make their bow to the Prince Commander Gillis who came out here from Washington as the special representative of the government to conduct the Prince across the continent made a little speech. He explained that the Prince was in very bad health and too weak for any exertion; therefore he instructed his listeners that they were to refrain from attempting to shake his hand. Among the listeners was Bishop Nichols but there was a great deal of music and noise at the time and he failed to catch the import of Commander Gillis' words. He was among the first to greet the Prince which he did with a cordial smile and an outstretched arm. Making prisoner of the imperial right hand he shook it vigorously and lengthily, at the same time repeating to the Prince some of the flattering things which he had heard about him from the junior Nichols who is a missionary in China. Meanwhile the line of dignitaries was halted and the Prince whose chest was plastered with a pound or so of antiphlogistician grew redder and redder from the vigorous handshaking. When Bishop Nichols retired in smiling unconsciousness of the sensation he had created he learned that Prince Hsun could not understand a word of English.

What the Prince Bought

When the Call published the exclusive news that the Prince was here to buy a fleet of warships for the Chinese navy everybody in town gasped with surprise and gratification. It was almost too good to be true. We all realized what a great thing it would be for the town to have the Union Iron Works running at full blast once more. It was to give us a new spurt of prosperity, to fill several thousand dinner pails that have been empty or only half-full for many a day and so on and so on. Then we discovered that the news was too good to be true. Schwab denied it and McGregor sighed and declared that he wished it were true but it wasn't. So our hopes were dashed to the ground. As a matter of fact, instead of ordering a fleet of battleships, the Prince made a solitary purchase while in this city and that of an instrument peculiarly dedicated to peace. He bought a pianola.

Colonel Marston's Dinner Party

There are several newspapermen in town who are wondering when Colonel Frank Marston, celebrated for his great personal beauty and his big hats, is going to give them a dinner party.

The dinner party was to have been given during the Native Sons' celebration but it wasn't and the newspapermen are beginning to wonder whether Colonel Marston has forgotten all about it. If he has, the colonel has a very bad memory for the happening which elicited from him the promise of the dinner was not of a sort to be easily forgotten. It occurred in Union Square on the first day of the Native Sons' celebration. From the bewildering number of our picturesque colonels Colonel Marston was selected to escort Queen Grace to Union Square and there to introduce her to Mayor McCarthy and the assembled multitude with a few well turned phrases. With martial air and swelling front Colonel Marston performed his part admirably up to a certain point—and then he fell down. There was all the chivalry of a Bayard in his demeanor as he handed the Queen from her carriage and all the triumph of Coeur de Lion in his tread as he escorted her to the throne. In gesture and delivery he was superb as he uttered his first sentence: "Mr. Mayor, California today presents to you the fairest of her daughters to reign over these festivities." The hearts of the assembled multitude thrilled to this burst of impassioned eloquence and waited for more. And again the mellifluous voice of Colonel Marston caressed the balmy breeze: "California—" He was stuck, so he began again: "California—" Still the words refused to flow and the crowd began to get nervous. "California—" repeated Colonel Marston and in the stillness somebody giggled. Colonel Marston was by this time in a cold perspiration of terror and he looked about appealingly for a friendly face. He caught the eye of James Rolph Jr. who smiled encouragingly, so he got a grip on his emotions and started afresh: "California—" Still the words would not loose themselves and with a final "California—" gasped convulsively Colonel Marston crumpled into his seat. "For God's sake, don't let the newspapermen put it in the papers," he besought one of the press agents of the festival as soon as he had recovered his poise. "I would rather give them twenty dollars apiece—I'll give them a dinner if they keep quiet about it." The press agent solemnly negotiated with the newspapermen (who of course wouldn't have published the thing anyway) and announced that in consideration of the dinner they would ignore the incident. But Colonel Marston hasn't given that dinner yet. It looks as though it's up to the colonel.

"And you really mean to tell me that a clairvoyante foretold your late husband's death?"

"Yes, indeed. She said there were brighter days in store for me."

Pothouse Politics

The leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League were thrown in a panic the other day when they learned of some of the results of their indiscreet maneuvering. First came the news of the boom-erang effect of the endorsement of Democratic judges by Meyer Lissner's Good Government League of Los Angeles. This bit of treachery provoked great indignation among the friends of Republican candidates for the judiciary, and there was talk of retaliation through the medium of Theodore Bell Republican Clubs. The disquieting tidings reached the Hon. Hiram Johnson who ceased lambasting the octopus long enough to throw a series of conniption fits. A little later some of his friends were around town saying that if somebody didn't watch out Hiram would get mad and tell the truth about the conspiracy to capture the Supreme Court for the purposes of a certain will contest. More trouble arose when some of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League leaders got hold of Congressman Julius Kahn and tried to pledge him against Joe Cannon. These particular leaders, though ostensibly Republicans, have taken a contract to send Walter MacArthur the labor agitator to Congress, and they thought it would be a master-stroke of political strategy to get Julius on record. Much to their surprise the Congressman did not hesitate for a moment. He said that as he was more interested in the World's Fair than in anything else he would rather go down to defeat than give offense to the most powerful man in Congress, one who is in sympathy with us and who will be able to swing the votes of the Illinois delegation. So Julius is on record, but so also is the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. On the face of the record it appears that the League doesn't care a tinker's imprecation about the World's Fair; that it is absorbed in its own pothouse politics.

It Smells of Tainted Money

"Why put difficulties in the Ocean Shore's way?" is the question propounded by that beloved organ of the Pharisees, the Boughten Bulletin, uncompromising foe of all arrogant public service corporations. Candor compels the reply that there is no reason why difficulties should be put in the Ocean Shore's way. But why this solicitude for the Ocean Shore on the part of the Boughten Bulletin? This is a question that gives one pause. On what terms did the men who are trying to get their money out of the Ocean Shore obtain the sympathy of our thrifty contemporary? If money has been appropriated for the purchase of the Bulletin's columns who knows but that money may come from the same source to be applied to other base uses not so remote from public concern. Whatever the boughten journal advocates in the interest of capital the most charitable and credulous of us cannot view with anything but suspicion. This being the case, how indiscreet it was for the Ocean Shore magnates to enlist the Bulletin's support! This indiscretion appears all the more glaring when one considers the argument advanced in behalf of the corporation. "The company," says the Bulletin, "is not asking for an extension of the franchise, but merely for an extension of the time within which to complete the Richmond terminal"; also, "This terminal is important to the residents of the Richmond district. If used for freight at all it can be used only for incoming freight. Moreover the operation of the road is entirely under the control of the Board of Supervisors, and it is within the power of the Board to compel the road to do its freight business in the Richmond district at night." All of which is true enough, and yet it excites curiosity as to the nature of the consideration that induced the Bulletin to alter its views regarding public service corporations that after getting something for nothing from faithless public officials are caught in an embarrassing position.

Why Suspicion is Warranted

In this instance the Bulletin is far from subtle in its disingenuousness. The suggestion that boards of supervisors may always be depended upon to protect the interests of the residents of Richmond is so obviously insincere as to savor of satire. And as for the proposition that the company should get what it asks for because it is not asking for a new franchise everybody must know that it does not involve a principle peculiar to the philosophy of the belsawger of journalism. The United Railroads didn't ask for a new franchise in Market street when it asked for permission to operate the Sutter street cars by electricity from Sansome to the ferry. The United Railroads asked for a privilege over which the Supervisors would have had absolute control. Furthermore the privilege asked for was important to these same residents of Richmond about whom the Bulletin is now solicitous. They asked that it be granted, as did also many civic and industrial bodies. And all the while the Bulletin objected. The United Railroads merely asked for permission in the interest of the public as well as for the benefit of the corporation to substitute electricity for horses, and the Bulletin demanded as a condition precedent that the company be required to yield certain valuable rights to the city. No such demand is now being urged in the case of the Ocean Shore. The Bulletin is heartily in favor of giving this company anything it wants. Yet this is the company that obtained from the city the most valuable franchise that was given away during the Schmitz administration. Now I have not the slightest objection to the granting of the extension of time asked for. I would like to see Downey Harvey reconp himself for the losses he has sustained in financing this railroad enterprise, but I cannot restrain my curiosity with respect to the Bulletin's profound concern for its welfare. I would like to know whether Downey has been again stood up by the predaceous business manager, or whether this recent editorial boost is but part of a job lot bought at the time the Bulletin and other dailies, though they knew the road was drifting into bankruptcy, were hired to stimulate the sale of bonds by telling the people of the great opportunity to get in on the ground floor.

Ocean Shore and the Supervisors

I happened in at the meeting of the Board of Supervisors last Monday when this matter of extending the time on the Ocean Shore's permit was under consideration. It was the first time that I had seen the Board in action and I was not impressed. If I wished to typify clarity of thought, elegance of diction or the ability to seize quickly the salient points of an argument I should not select those members of the Board whom I had the opportunity of listening to. There was Supervisor Herget, for instance. This legislator who has a place in fustiana as "Young Mitchell" was apparently an attentive listener to the debate. Yet when Supervisor Loughery referred to "route number two" he arose in considerable excitement and asked when an alternative route for the Geary street road had been chosen. It was necessary for Supervisor Loughery to explain to him that the Board was discussing the Ocean Shore, not the Geary street line. While Downey Harvey was arguing for the extension Supervisor Healey pointed a finger at him and asked: "Could I get on the Ocean Shore train at Twenty-second and Potrero and ride to Dumbarton?" to which Harvey made the obvious reply that the Ocean Shore did not run to Dumbarton. And then there was Supervisor Nelson who demanded with considerable heat: "Mr. Harvey, what I want to know is, do you come here in good faith?" That struck me as a triumph of cross-examination. It reminded me of the mamma who asked the young man: "Are your intentions toward my daughter strictly honorable?" whereupon he made the obvious reply: "I regret to say, madame, that they are dishonorable, strictly dishonorable." It is trying on the temper to be badgered with such questions as these but Harvey acquitted himself admirably.

"Is a cord of wood much, pop?"

"Well, my son, it all depends on whether you are burning it or chopping it."

A Foul Slander

My attention has been called to a most infamous libel on the town of Berkeley in the October issue of Pearson's Magazine. The author of it is H. E. Twinells, who has written an article on the methods of swindlers who conduct fake auctions in stores filled with brummagem ware such as spurious ivories, bronzes and "paintings by the old masters." This writer tells us that the ideal city "in which to carry on the modern three-card monte game" is Ottawa, Illinois, but that "Berkeley, California, is comparable to Ottawa from the auctioneer's viewpoint." This is a most damaging bit of slander that should not be permitted to pass unchallenged. Berkeley comparable to Ottawa in the matter of gullibility! Berkeley a garden spot for charlatans, quacks and mountebanks! This is too much. Nothing short of a mass-meeting will enable the people of Berkeley to resent fittingly the sinister imputation, the contumelious reproach involved in this utterly unwarranted attack. If it be permitted to go unchallenged, who knows but that in time Berkeley may be degraded to the level of Milpitas on the vaudeville stage and derisively alluded to as the abiding place of the hopelessly unsophisticated. The truth of course is that Berkeley is our most enlightened and cultured community. Berkeley is the epitome of modern civilization and culture. It contains all the products of every moral zone under the sun. There as nowhere else on this sublunary planet taste is cultivated, manners refined, views broadened and natures spiritualized. No brummagem is ever admitted to Berkeley. Even the police department is a man of such superior intelligence that he can distinguish an old master from a chromo and discourse learnedly about Ibsen and Maeterlinck, not to mention Euripides. What would San Francisco do without Berkeley? It's Berkeley that sets us right whenever we are in doubt about a new patriot. The professors of Berkeley have an acid test to which they subject every reformer that bids for public confidence on this side of the bay. It is the same test which they apply when an auction faker comes along, the same that was applied to Heney on whom they had no hesitation in bestowing a certificate of character. The average citizen of Berkeley has as fine a taste for bronzes and ivories as for moral issues and political questions. He is a man of the world, is this commuter, who circulates freely every day along a bee line from his office to his home, absorbing by some mysterious process everything that is worth knowing about men, motives, and affairs generally. You can't fool him; nor can you tell him anything. He is that exceptional man that knows it all—in short a perfect Boke.

In There No Chivalry in Chico?

It is too bad that the above query has to be put but stern duty demands that the question be asked. Let me explain quickly that I am not going to reopen the Van Liew case. Far be it from me to apply a Diamond match to that bit of gun cotton. I am moved to question Chico's chivalry because of an article which I read recently in the Chico Record, an article dealing with the great happiness which has come, in the winter of life, into the youthful hearts of Chico's two oldest inhabitants. It seems that Jim Finnium, aged eighty-three, has taken unto himself a wife who was Mrs. Fish Wilson, aged seventy-two. To this triumph of Cupid the Chico Record devoted considerable space and my heart glowed as I read of the romance. But the glow died away when I came to these ominous words: "Mrs. Finnium indignantly denied the published story that Mr. Finnium has been making his home with her for three years." Is it thus that the unchivalrous newspapermen of Chico cloud the happiness of a bride and groom? Do they actually obtrude such questions on couples blushing with hymeneal bliss? Alas and alack, what is Chico coming to? Rather the skeleton rattling his bones at the bridal feast than such a question. Where was the blue pencil of the editor when that noxious sentence passed beneath his eye? Has the glory that was Butte and the grandeur that was Chico departed forever?

The Zealous Police

Everybody who has had much experience with criminal prosecutions knows that when the police are intent on establishing the guilt of a person suspected or accused of a crime, especially of a crime that has excited great public interest, they often pursue their object with more zeal and enthusiasm than are compatible with a conscientious performance of duty. It is not unusual for detectives to manufacture evidence to bear out their preconceived notions of guilt. While nothing of this kind has been done so far as I know in the case of the man who is accused of killing Eva Swan, I have observed a discrepancy between the statements of Detective Ed Wren and Marie Messerschmidt, which is worth noting as it serves to illustrate what I have said. Both statements were published in the Examiner of Tuesday last. This is what Wren said: "Miss Messerschmidt tells me that Dr. Grant told her that he was not afraid that Parker would tell anything about the girl because he was the person responsible for her trouble." This is what Marie Messerschmidt said: "Dr. Grant told me that he had no fear that Mr. Parker would ever mention anything about Eva Swan. He said that he, Parker, was evidently concerned in the case." Not a vast discrepancy, but it will suffice. The nurse was not quoted correctly. As quoted by the detective one might conclude that Parker had told Grant that he was responsible for the woman's condition and that Grant spoke of the matter authoritatively. But from what the maid says it appears that Grant merely surmised what he expressed. By just such slight shades of difference men have been sent to the gallows.

A Patriotic Englishman

I noticed the Honorable Acland Hood in the lobby of one of the hotels the other day and I wondered whether he would find occasion to repeat his exploit of a few years ago. As becomes a brother of the present Lord St. Vincent and a descendant of the famous Admiral Hood who won the battle of St. Vincent against the Spaniards in 1797 the Honorable Acland Hood is a very patriotic Britisher. He is also a mining man of large interests and his business occasionally brings him to this city. He was here at the time of the Boer War and put up at the Palace Hotel. One evening when the Palace orchestra was discoursing music the Honorable Acland Hood, fired with the deeds of the British Army in South Africa and mayhap fired by refreshment of a liquid nature, sent to the leader of the orchestra a request that he play "God Save the Queen." Being a German whose sympathies were all with the Boers the leader indignantly refused to comply with the request whereupon the Honorable Acland Hood swatted the leader and put the orchestra into a panic. It was great fun while it lasted but it didn't last long because the hotel authorities interfered to prevent carnage. The Honorable Acland Hood is not as impetuous now as he was then, but still he may do something spectacular before he leaves the city.

A Critic of Grammar

When one sets himself up as a judge of the language used by others he should be extremely careful not to be guilty of glaring errors himself. Of all the dogmatists in the world the grammarian and the censor of grammar dig the most pitfalls for themselves. Of this I was reminded when I read in Sunday's Chronicle a discourse on slang written by Waldemar Young. In the course of his disquisition Mr. Young visits his anger upon the inoffensive little contraction "ain't." "It does not belong anywhere in the language," he declares. "It is the surest and truest sign of near or complete illiteracy. It has about as much reason for being as the verniform appendix." To which I have the hardihood to object. Risking the charge of illiteracy, near or complete, I insist that "ain't" is a good word when it is used properly and reference to the Standard Dictionary will support my contention. In that great volume "ain't" is given as a colloquial form of "am not" and "are not" and I have yet to learn that colloquial words do not "belong anywhere in the language." Even Dean Alford, the Canterbury precisian who wrote "The Queen's English," while stating that "ain't" was proscribed by usage, admitted that it was very frequently used, "even by highly educated persons." As the Dean wrote in 1864 and as "highly educated persons" have continued to use the colloquial contraction it is only fair to concede that the proscription of usage has been removed. It may be as useless to the language as the vermiform appendix to the body but it is in and of the language and it cannot be removed by an operation. For one, I ain't afraid to use it.

Hackett Wants a Valet

Are ingenues more plentiful than valets? Is a good actor easier to find than a competent "man"? If James K. Hackett were asked these questions his answer would probably be in the affirmative. For Hackett wants a valet and has had such difficulty in finding one that he has been compelled to advertise in the papers. No such difficulty did Hackett experience when he sought players for the company which he has been organizing. Ever since he finished his engagement at the Alcazar Hackett has been preparing to take a company on the road and he has been fairly inundated with requests for places. Leading men and leading women, ingenues and juveniles, "heavies" and light comedians and character actors have swarmed upon him from the four points of the peninsula, all eager to shed their radiance in the company of the star. But not so in the matter of a valet. Until he arrived in San Francisco Hackett was happy in the services of an ideal valet. His man Gorman had been with him for years and knew his every want before it was expressed. But Gorman likes San Francisco and is anxious to stay here. So if you happened to look last Sunday in the classified advertisements of the papers you noticed that Hackett's man Gorman was looking for a place as a valet or butler and that Hackett was looking for a new valet. Players nest in every tree but the valet is a rare bird. We don't train very many of them in this vicinity.

They Make You Swear

Now that the Home Telephone Company is making desperate efforts to extend its system in this city it may be worth while to consider the news from Los Angeles where the corporation has been entrenched for some years. R. G. Loucks, a public spirited citizen of that city, is rousing sentiment in favor of a plan to compel the Home and the Pacific States telephone companies to interchange calls. How the companies can be forced to adopt such a plan it is not easy to perceive, but nobody need be told that two independent telephone systems are an imposition on the public. This fact has become deeply impressed on the people of Los Angeles now that the phones of two companies are in general use, and especially now that the automatic phones are in need of repair. Speaking of the automatic instruments the Spectator of Los Angeles says: "They are a device of Satan himself, invented to facilitate the breaking of the commandment against blasphemy. The automatic service is 'automatic' only in giving you a fair percentage of the parties you do not want. It is exasperating, soul trying, patience wearing and conducive of profanity."

Jack Gleason's Play

That cherished San Francisco product Jack Gleason, captain of the pugilistic industry and baron of the moving picture trade, is now in New York, raising ructions along the Great White Way. And what, think you, is the motive of Jack's visit to the San Francisco of the Atlantic seaboard? Nothing else than the production of that great American play, "Might's Right." Jack feels that if an acknowledged dramatist like Wilson Mizner can invade the field of pugilism by assuming (no matter for how short a time) the management of a prizefighter like Stanley Ketchel, there is no reason why he, a manager of scrappers and a scrapper among managers, should not take another whirl at the elusive theatrical game. So he has brought "Might's Right" to the little town where the big productions come from and is at present, no doubt, negotiating with Charlie Frohman or Lee Shubert for an all-star cast and a mammoth production. I regret to say that the chroniclers of things theatrical in Manhattan are treating Jack and his play with levity. One of them says that it weighs in manuscript form less than three pounds and is the champion of its class. Another suggests that as the play has a bad "Right" it would be a good thing for Gleason to show what he could do with "Might's Left." But I understand that Gleason is not discouraged. He is too old in the publicity game to resent frivolity and too young in the dramatic field to lose confidence; so he is as busy as a little bee. Let us hope that he will not be stung.

Stellmann's Book of Photos

A beautiful book, fresh from the publisher, lies before me. It is bound in strong boards and on the cover, above a picture of the ruined portals of the old Towne residence, appears the title, "The Vanished Ruin Era; San Francisco's Classic Artistry of Ruin." It is a book of pictures illustrating the disaster of 1906; illustrating it, not from the viewpoint of the historian but from that of the artist. The photographs from which the pictures were made by a process known as mezzogravure were taken by Louis J. Stellmann who is known locally as a newspaper and magazine writer as well as a photographer of distinction. To make the book more attractive Stellmann has written verses to interpret the pictures and the work has been brought out by Paul Elder and Company in a manner to reflect credit upon the bookcraft. The pictures are very beautiful in themselves but their beauty has been enhanced by the process of reproduction which while losing no photographic detail has given them the mellow tones of painting. It is a book to delight the eye as well as the mind.

Some Splendid Pictures

The desolate beauty of burned and shaken San Francisco has all but passed away and memory cannot retain many of the pictures that were burned into the brains of our people in the days of disaster. It is fitting therefore that we should have a lasting record of those scenes and some of the most beautiful will be preserved to future generations in this book. The classic ruins of the observatory on Strawberry Hill, the Gothic splendor of gutted Grace Church, the Grecian impressiveness of the Towne portal are three of the splendid ruins which Stellmann has treated with sympathetic artistry. Of many other subjects it is sufficient to call attention to his picture of a refugee camp in one of the parks. In composition this picture is worthy of comparison with many canvases which I have seen. Looking at it one forgets that it is not a painting, so it may be set down as a triumph of photography. The personality of the artist is mirrored in all the pictures, so it was unnecessary for Stellmann to include a picture of himself taken at a window which commands a view of the reconstructed city. The intrusion of an individual portrait in a series like this jars a little. But in a book so beautiful this criticism is perhaps hypercritical. Emphatically it is a book to be placed among one's art portfolios within easy reach on the library shelf.

As to Stellmann's Verses

In his verses Stellmann has not been so uniformly happy as in his pictures. He is a master of photographic technique and it is not given to many to master the technical requirements of more than one medium. Several times he tries blank verse, a very hazardous attempt. Whom have we that can write good blank verse? When he adopts the lyric form Stellmann is not always a conscientious rhymers as when he associates "trust" and "holocaust," "expanse" and "eminence," "metropolis" and "Acropolis." "In gray mezzo-tints immuring Silhouetted huts and trees" is not a happy expression. It is the photographer speaking, not the poet. Looking at the old Hall of Justice Stellmann sings: "Where once sat the stern, silent judges, Dispensing the wrong-doer's fate." Is it possible that by the "stern, silent judges" Stellmann means Police Judges Conlan and Cabanis? If so his adjectives are somewhat at fault.

When Harris Was Silenced

Over in San Rafael there abides a newspaperman by the name of D. Wooster Taylor who occasionally succumbs to the divine afflatus and bursts into amazing poetry. All subjects are alike poetical to this wooer of the muse and he possesses the unique distinction of having found matter for versifying even in the prosaic graft prosecution. Taylor has a papa who is very proud of his son's endowment and who never misses an opportunity to enhance his fame by reciting his poetry. Taylor Sr. has been known to recite his son's verses to his brother who is the popular but unpoetical sheriff of Marin and it need not be mentioned that the man who will recite poetry to a sheriff will stop at nothing. It happens that D. Wooster Taylor is the author of some verses on the San Francisco disaster of which Taylor pere is particularly proud. Also it happened one day recently that Porter Ashe who knows Taylor pere and has long since gauged his amiable weakness was crossing to Sausalito with Larry Harris and Dick Hotaling. Espying Taylor pere on the boat he presented him to Harris and Hotaling and immediately opened the subject of Wooster's poetry with particular reference to the earthquake verses. Without the least difficulty the proud papa was induced to recite them. At the conclusion of the recitation Ashe fixed Harris with a glittering eye and declared: "Do you know, Larry, I think those are unquestionably the best verses inspired by the earthquake and fire." And Harris who is just a little bit proud of his own "Damndest Finest Ruins" did not dare to utter a word. For the first time in his career as a jester the Family man was silenced. No matter how wittily he might have retorted his comment would have been credited to the prompting of envy so he held his peace. When the roll of Porter Ashe's achievements is made up it will be recorded conspicuously that he silenced Larry Harris. The feat is unique.

A Viscountess on Health

In the tight little island across the Atlantic there is a noblewoman yclept Viscountess Muriel Helmsley whose soul is filled with the ambition of a social uplifter. Believing that old Latin tag about "mens sana in corpore sano" the viscountess has drawn up ten commandments of health which she proposes to disseminate throughout civilization to its tremendous betterment. Here are her commandments:

1. Keep windows open day and night.
2. Do not spit.
3. Breathe through the nose by keeping the mouth shut.
4. Drink pure water.
5. Eat slowly; take well-cooked meals; cultivate regular habits.
6. Wear loose clothing of seasonable material.
7. Take regular open-air exercise in sunshine if possible.
8. Wash the whole body at least once a week.
9. Work, but don't worry.
10. Get house drains certified by sanitary authority.

That the viscountess, like so many other reformers, is a severe disciplinarian may be inferred from commandment number eight. To insist on a hebdomadal "bawth" is going pretty strong. Why not compromise on a fortnightly or monthly ablution?

A Long Banking Service

The recent absorption of the Savings and Loan Society by the San Francisco Savings Union has resulted in the retirement of several men who have been prominently identified with the local banking business for many years. Among them is Mr. William A. Boston who for some years has been cashier of the Savings and Loan Society and who numbered thirty-five years in the service of the well known institution. Mr. Boston entered the service of the "Clay Street Bank" as the Savings and Loan Society was familiarly known in 1875 when he was quite a young man. At that time it was the largest savings bank on the coast. Not long afterwards the failure of the Bank of California and the collapse of the Comstock mining boom caused a general run on the savings banks and the liquidation of some of them. The Savings and Loan Society suffered with the rest, losing ten millions of deposits. Mr. Boston was paying teller at the time and paid out a great part of this immense sum. During his connection with the bank he saw the coming and going of seven presidents, two cashiers and four regimes. Although he has received several offers to continue in the banking business Mr. Boston is taking a well earned rest. Being still in the prime of life he undoubtedly has many years of activity before him.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—No. 4831, Department 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of LILLIE MANNING KELLY (also known as LILLIE MANNING KELLEY), Deceased.

It appearing to the Court by the Petition this day presented and filed by Mamie Manning, Administratrix of the Estate of Lillie Manning Kelly (also known as Lillie Manning Kelly), deceased, praying for an order of sale of real estate, that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate of said decedent, for the purposes herein stated.

It is ordered that all persons interested in the said Estate appear before this Court on Monday, the 31st day of October, 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m., in the Courtroom of the above named Superior Court, Department No. 10 thereof, at the Grant Building, corner of Market and Seventh Streets, San Francisco, California, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted to the Administratrix for the sale of said real estate, at private sale or public auction, as she shall judge to be most beneficial to said Estate, and that a copy of this Order be published once a week for four (4) weeks successively, before said hearing in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in the said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Done in open Court this 28th day of September, 1910.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

S. W. MacKENBUHR, Atty. for Administratrix,

 William J. Gaynor, Mayor of New York, attempt, August 9, 1910.

Queen Mary's Position

The position of Queen Mary, under the English laws, is a curious one. As far as her private business is concerned she is not regarded as a married woman, the fiction of law being that affairs of state consume all the time of the king and therefore no responsibility for the queen's private affairs rests upon him. She is the only woman in Great Britain who does not come within the scope of the Married Women's Property Act. If the queen contracted debts in her husband's name he would not be responsible for them as any other husband would. The king cannot be sued for debt but the queen can be, and it is claimed by some authorities that should she be left a widow and desire to marry again she could not do so without the special license and commission of the king's successor.

A New Cigarette on the Market

One of the best cigarettes made, the "Laurens," has recently been placed on the local market. The factory in Cairo, Egypt, the oldest in the world, has lately established a branch in New York. This is a cigarette that will appeal to connoisseurs. The "Laurens" is used by the Emperor of Austria-Hungary, the King of Italy, the President of France, the Khedive of Egypt and other great personages of Europe.

By Lord Dunsany

The Giant Poppy

I dreamt that I went back to the hills I knew, whence on a clear day you can see the walls of Ilion and the plains of Roncevalles. There used to be woods along the tops of those hills with clearings in them where the moonlight fell, and there, when no one watched, the fairies danced.

But there were no woods when I went back, no fairies nor distant glimpse of Ilion or plains of Roncevalles, only one giant poppy waved in the wind, and as it waved it hummed "Remember not." And by its oak-like stem a poet sat, dressed like a shepherd and playing an ancient tune softly upon a pipe. I asked him if the fairies had passed that way or anything olden.

He said: "The poppy has grown apace and is killing gods and fairies. Its fumes are suffocating the world, and its roots drain it of its beautiful strength." And I asked him why he sat on the hills I knew, playing an olden tune.

And he answered: "Because the tune is bad for the poppy, which would otherwise grow more swiftly; and because if the brotherhood of which I am one were to cease to pipe on the hills men would stray over the world and be lost or come to terrible ends. We think we have saved Agamemnon."

Then he fell to piping again that olden tune while the wind among the poppy's sleepy petals murmured "Remember not. Remember not."

Charon

Charon leaned forward and rowed. All things were one with his weariness.

It was not with him a matter of years or of centuries but of wide floods of time, and an old heaviness and a pain in the arms that had become for him part of the scheme that the gods had made and was of a piece with Eternity.

If the gods had even sent him a contrary wind it would have divided all time in his memory into two equal slabs.

So grey were all things always where he was that if any radiance lingered a moment among the dead, on the face of such a queen perhaps as Cleopatra, his eyes could not have perceived it.

It was strange that the dead nowadays were coming in such numbers. They were coming in thousands where they used to come in fifties.

It was neither Charon's duty nor his wont to ponder in his grey soul why these things might be. Charon leaned forward and rowed.

Then no one came for awhile. It was not usual for the gods to send no one down from Earth for such a space. But the gods knew best.

Then one man came alone. And the little shade sat shivering on a lonely bench and the great boat pushed off. Only one passenger; the gods knew best. And great and weary Charon rowed on and on beside the little, silent, shivering ghost.

And the sound of the river was like a mighty sigh that Grief in the beginning had sighed among her sisters, and that could not die like the echoes of human sorrow failing on earthly hills, and was as old as Time and the pain in Charon's arms.

Then the boat from the slow, grey river loomed up to the coast of Dis, and the little, silent shade still shivering stepped ashore, and Charon turned the boat to go wearily back to the world. Then the little shadow spoke, that had been a man.

"I am the last," he said.

No one had ever made Charon smile before, no one before had ever made him weep.

Fame

Fame as she walked at evening in a city saw the painted face of Notoriety flaunting beneath a gaslamp, and many kneeled unto her in the dirt of the road.

"Who are you?" Fame said to her.

"I am Fame," said Notoriety.

Then Fame stole softly away so that no one knew she had gone.

And Notoriety presently went forth and all her worshippers rose and followed after, and she led them, as was most meet, to her native Pit.

The Bishop Won

The late Bishop Selwyn delighted to tell the following incident in his varied experience: While Bishop of Litchfield he was walking one day in the Black Country, and observing a group of colliers seated by the roadside in a semicircle, with a brass kettle in front of them, he inquired what was going on. "Why, yer honor," replied a grave-looking member, "it's a sort of wager. Yon kettle is a prize for the fellow who can tell the biggest lie, and I am the umpire." Amazed and shocked, the good bishop said reprovingly, "Why, my friends, I have never told a lie that I know of since I was born." There was a dead silence, only broken by the voice of the umpire, who said in a deliberate tone, "Give the bishop the kettle."

The Pope an Early Riser

The pope has become stouter than he was and less inclined to physical exertion, but altogether he is more robust and finds mental labor less of a burden. Of one thing he is proud, he says, namely, that he is the earliest riser in the whole apostolic palace, as it is his constant practice to get up at dawn, a habit which he himself says dates from his early childhood, when he was obliged to get up with the sun in order to have time to do his lessons and to cover, barefooted, the several miles which separated him from the nearest school.

The excellent state of his health makes people wonder whether the life which the head of the Roman Church has imposed upon himself since the fall of the temporal power—that is to say, of remaining always within the Vatican—is not conducive to longevity. In fact, while in the past the average duration of a pontificate was from four to five years, since 1870 we have had the longest reigns known among the occupants of the chair of St. Peter. Pius IX was the first to surpass St. Peter's in length, while Leo XIII, who was elected chiefly because he was supposed to be so feeble that his life would be a short one, remained pope for twenty-five years, and Pius X has already worn the fisherman's ring for seven years.

Of course, there is a prediction that the present pope will not outlive the nine years of pontificate, because he was nine years a parish priest, nine years a bishop and nine years patriarch of Venice. However, whenever he has read in the papers, which he peruses carefully every day, that he is also expected not to be more than nine years pope, he has exclaimed:

"This time I am going to disappoint them."

PURITY ESSENTIAL

In no other form of food is Purity so absolutely essential as in milk products. Richness is also necessary, as without richness, milk is of little value as a food. Purity and richness are the embodiment of Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. As a food for infants or for general household purposes it has no equal.

Is Enid Gregg Engaged?

Has Miss Enid Gregg whispered the little word that disposes of heart and hand? Rumors there have been aplenty during the short time that Miss Gregg has been out, carrying from lip to lip the story of this or that or the other chap's infatuation for the most Parisian of our younger maids but inevitably Contradiction has overtaken Rumor and felled him in his tracks. This time, however, it looks as though there might be truth at the bottom of the well and the friends of the fascinating Enid are pumping for dear life to draw the secret out. The fact is that Miss Gregg is wearing an unusually handsome diamond ring and that she cannot altogether hide the blushes that suffuse her pretty

The charming daughter of Judge and Mrs. Henry C. Gesford of Napa. Her engagement to George F. Jones, the son of former State Senator Jones of Oroville, was recently announced. The marriage will unite two well known California families. Miss Gesford graduated from Miss Head's school and is highly accomplished.

face when she is asked pointblank who is the happy man. Shall I hazard a guess? All's fair in love, so here goes. Suppose it were Roger Topp? Certainly he is a most eligible young man. His widowed mother is very wealthy and he has a bright future in the real estate business which he prefers to the brokerage pursuits he engaged in after emerging from Stanford. There is only one objection and that light as floss. Mr. and Mrs. Wellington Gregg would like their elder daughter to see a little more of the world before she changes her name. But when young love comes in at the door such considerations are apt to fly out at the window and Enid is just sweet-and-twenty, not a day more, while Roger Topp has not passed twenty-three. Let us keep an eye on these two youngsters and on that beautiful diamond ring. During the past week, by the way, Enid Gregg and her sister Ethel have been sojourning at Bohemian Grove with Mr. and Mrs. Haig Patigian, and Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Sloan.

They Are Authors in Their Teens

Let me mention first of all that Miss Marie Louise Foster gave a luncheon during the week at her home, The Hacienda, Ross Valley, in honor of Miss Edith Von Schroeder. In addition to the charming daughter of the Baron and Baroness there were present some of the most prominent of the season's buds including Dora Winn, Lee Girvin, Martha Foster, Kate Peterson, Nina Van Bergen, Dorothy Woodward, Ethel McAllister, Miriam McNear, Fredericka and Cora Otis, Wilmot Hotaling and Florence and Muriel Williams. I merely chronicle this affair to lead gracefully to the statement that Miss Marie Louise Foster does not confine her activities to the dull round of social festivities. Far from it. Before many days Miss Foster will have burst upon public notice as collaborator on a book. To have one's name on a title page at the tender age of nineteen is no mean achievement and when the name is that of a society bud we may draw the conclusion that the young lady has more than the ordinary equipoise and understands the hollowness of merely social distinction. What I say of Miss Foster applies with equal force to Miss Janet Von Schroeder for she is the other young lady—she too is just nineteen—who has a hand in the forthcoming book.

What the Book is About

The book which these two young ladies have piloted safely across the shoals that lead to publication is entitled "How Much Can a Little Tell." The text is the work of Miss Von Schroeder who makes her first bow to the literary public under the nom de guerre of "J. Marion." The illustrations which consist of drawings of California wild flowers are the work of Miss Foster who has disguised her identity by using only her first two initials "M. L." The book has been published by the Philopolis Press and will be on the book stands this coming Monday. But there will only be a limited edition, these young ladies being used to exclusiveness. The letterpress will consist of a number of gracefully worded sentiments, the first fruits of Miss Von Schroeder's maturing mind and the illustrations will be by way of marginal decorations in black and white. By the way, Miss Foster is not the daughter of the A. W. Fosters who reside in San Rafael but of Mr. and Mrs. Charles J. Foster of Ross Valley.

This Suspense is Awful

In the Cudahy-Brewer impasse San Francisco has a cause celebre—pardon my French; I am merely following the latest lead of the newspaper bavardes—comparable only with the Elkins-d'Abuzzi imbroglio. Here is an engagement which seems constantly to approach the matrimonial stage only to veer off suddenly with antic perversity. When, oh when will this marriage take place? Must we be forever kept on tiptoe about it? I sincerely hope not, for the business of the social world must amble along and Miss Nora Brewer and Ned Cudahy have already done a lot to distract our attention from more important matters. It seems to me that a committee of our most influential society people should be appointed to wait upon the young couple and request them to settle the matter definitely. Until the knot is actually tied it will be impossible to give adequate attention to the burning questions of the moment which include the status of the bolster gown, the exact number of the season's debutantes, the list of guests for Ned Greenway's birthday party, the comparative advantages of tea at the Palace and cocktails at the St. Francis, the influence of the Crocker ball on social recognition, the qualifications for admission to Mrs. Carolan's salon, the intentions of the Duke of Bavaria, the attitude of our Assembly leaders toward the young Teddy Roosevelts, the comparative chances of young Havemeyer and Joe Eastland for the hand of Vesta Shortridge Bruguere and the likelihood of Miss Jennie Crocker finishing the season heart-whole. Until Miss Brewer names the day when she will POSITIVELY marry Ned Cudahy or calls off the engagement all these tremendous matters must remain in abeyance.

Mrs. Miller Graham's Sadness

I sympathize heartily with Mrs. William Miller Graham's resentment at the newspaper notoriety which formed the only disagreeable feature of her triumphant London season. The fact that the newspapers of her native State were most active in expatiating upon the grandeur of her entertainments, the luxuriousness of her gowns and the elaborate ingenuity of her drawing room "stunts" makes this notoriety all the harder to bear. At the same time there is reason for this attitude of the California press. Mrs. Miller Graham's has not yet become a familiar name in the lists of those present at our most exclusive functions. To many of those who help to dictate what's what and who's who in California she is a stranger. So when she burst upon London society in blinding effulgence it was quite natural that we of California should sit up and take notice. If she could take London by storm, we wondered, what might she not do if she decided to queen it over San Francisco society? But in spite of this natural interest there was no excuse for the extravagant notice which was bestowed upon Mrs. Graham and now that we are aware of the lady's attitude it behooves us to let her alone in her simple unostentatious social pursuits. There is really no good reason why a woman of wealth should not ride in a crystal motor car without attracting the attention of the busy bavardes. Cannot a hostess receive her guests in the garb of a sultana without having her severely modest costume heralded to the world as eccentricity? It is no wonder that Mrs. Graham is sad with the same sort of sadness that must overtake "Tommy" Sears from time to time when she reflects on the grievous misconception of her character which is conveyed to the millions by sensational newspapers. I feel as sad over this situation as Mrs. Graham.

The Status of Mrs. Hollis McKim

It may be true that Alfred G. Vanderbilt intends to marry the very fascinating Mrs. Smith

MISS REGINA VICARINO

Prima donna soprano of the Bevani Opera Company who was the guest of honor at the Home Club of Oakland during the week.

Hollis McKim who is now recuperating from the fatigue of a Reno divorce from her millionaire husband by an oriental tour, but if I understand the situation correctly the marriage will not take place for quite a long time. Dr. McKim did not acquiesce in the liberation of his wife from the marital bond and I understand that he has taken steps to test the validity of the Reno decree of divorce. As the doctor is very thorough-going in his methods that would involve litigation which could be carried all the way to the Supreme Court of the United States and meanwhile of course it would be impossible for Mrs. McKim to make another matrimonial venture. In other words it seems to me that Mrs. McKim's liberty, in so far as another marriage is concerned, is pretty well restricted and will continue so for two or three years at least. If Alfred Gwynn Vanderbilt is willing to wait that long it is possible that he may become the husband of the vivacious renovidow. But as a matter of fact is it at all stilled that he is the preferred suitor? How about our own Ray Baker?

A Town Talk Prophecy Fulfilled

Once more the announcement of an engagement has borne out the prediction made by Tantalus. In this instance it is fascinating Linda Cadwalader who has made known her enthrallment to Lorenzo Avenali, the brother of Ettore Avenali who is to marry Miss Mary Josselyn, Miss Cadwalader's chum. It is always difficult to single out the particular interest which draws young people together but in the present case a common interest in the literature of Dante, Tasso and Petrarch had much to do with the ripening of friendship into love. Having been the first to sense the romance it is my privilege to say, "Bless you, my children, bless you!" Miss Cadwalader is the daughter of the late George Cadwalader who was well known as an attorney in Sacramento before he moved to this city. Her mother died some time ago while visiting in the East. Her brother George Cadwalader married Charlotte Wilson, daughter of the late Russell Wilson. Mrs. Robert N. Graves, formerly Miss Annie Cadwalader, is her aunt. Mrs. William Mayo Newhall is her cousin.

The Lilienthal-Wiel Engagement

So Dr. Harry Wiel is going to desert the ranks of the bachelors! If this sort of thing continues we will have no bachelors at all, with the exception of those unfledged youths of gilded tint who are really too young to deserve the appellation. Now that the doctor has succumbed to the gentle influence of the blind divinity, his place will be vacant at many a festive board. At the Family he was one of the most popular members and they are drinking a multiplicity of toasts to his happiness. It was only recently that Dr. Wiel returned with Professor Morse Stephens from a European trip, part of which was enjoyed in company with Joe Eastland and Frank Good. Felicitations to the doctor! Miss Sarah Lilienthal has always been highly esteemed in society. The marriage tomorrow will be quite an event.

Freddie Greenwood's Hospitality

Freddie Greenwood is a cordial but very erratic host. His beautiful place at Belvedere is always open to his friends but Freddie, being a man of diverse interests social and otherwise, is not always on hand to greet the friends whom he invites to the shelter of his roof-tree. One of his friends discovered this eccentricity of Freddie a few days ago when he hid him to Belvedere at Freddie's behest and found no host to greet him. Thinking that Freddie was delayed the friend made himself comfortable but as the hours passed and there was no Freddie he tried to get into communication with him by telephone. But Freddie could not be found and the last Tiburon boat had left, so the guest made himself free of the home, had the servants supply his wants and found entertainment in the tricks of "Tony," Freddie's favorite cocker spaniel. The host arrived in the morning.

In Honor of Miss Vicarino

Miss Regina Vicarino, the sweet-voiced soprano of the Bevani Grand Opera Company, was the guest of honor at an elaborate luncheon at the Home Club of Oakland on Thursday. More than a hundred guests were present at the luncheon and had the opportunity of meeting the prima donna. An agreeable surprise to the guests was Miss Vicarino's singing of several of her favorite songs. Needless to say they were enthusiastically received. The afternoon at the Home Club was one of the few social diversions which Miss Vicarino has permitted herself since her return from abroad. She has been devoting herself exclusively to her musical studies. On that account the affair gave her unusual pleasure. Mrs. Glenn C. Barnhart presented the guests to Miss Vicarino.

The Pasmore Concert

The pupils of Mr. H. B. Pasmore will give a concert at Golden Gate Commandery Hall on the evening of Friday, October 7. They will be assisted by the Misses Mary, Suzanne, Dorothy and Harriet Pasmore, Mr. Benjamin Moore and Miss Lucy Lawrence. The program of sixteen numbers will be one of unusual attractiveness to music lovers. It will include selections from Verdi, Handel, Thomas, Donizetti, Tchaikowsky, Mascagni, Puccini, Gounod and Brahms. A feature of particular interest will be the rendition of Mr. Pasmore's recently composed "Look to This Day" which has never been given. The concert will last for one hour and a half.

Violet Romer's Debut

San Francisco is to add another to the list of interpretative dancers in the charming person of Miss Violet Romer, the daughter of Mrs. Ada Romer Shawhan, the well known artist. Miss Romer will make her debut on the afternoon of Sunday, October 9 at the Columbia Theater. Mrs. Ada Romer Shawhan will present her daughter, although the affair is announced as under the auspices of the well known woman's organization, the Papyrus Club. The little dancer will be assisted by a grand symphony orchestra of sixty musicians led by Bernat Jaulus, with Giulio Minetti as concert master and Luis Pamies, piano soloist. Violet Romer is a charmingly pretty, fair haired girl, barely 18 years old, who has for some years given before audiences of her mother's friends interpretations of music through classical dances. So widely has her talent become known that she has been approached by managers with offers of engagements, and she will leave shortly for the East. This will probably be the last opportunity vouchsafed San Franciscans of seeing her until she has made her reputation in the great world.

A Parting

It happened long ago, in those bygone days when Russian gentlefolk were wont to drive to one another's houses and stay there for a week or two, with horses, children and servants.

Once I chanced to spend some days in just such an old-fashioned hospitable home. All the society of the neighborhood were gathered there, whiling time away. There were many young people, young beautiful women and girls. All of them gave themselves up with the enthusiasm of youth to careless merriment. Our amusements were simple and unsophisticated, walking through the woods, rowing in boats, and housegames in the evenings.

Among the women's faces I noticed involuntarily one face. It was that of a girl, also a guest in the house, a friend of our young hostess. She was not more attractive or more beautiful than the others, and perhaps I would not have marked her at all but for her glance, a pensive, melancholy glance, which more than once she fixed on me steadily and attentively.

I felt myself continually under the influence of that glance and did not know how to free myself from it.

I tried to talk with her. She answered always with a loud, seemingly unnatural, forced laugh, and what she said had neither meaning nor interest.

At length the time of my departure drew nigh. I was to drive off with my friend, our host's son. We had both come out on the balcony, and everyone assembled there to see us off. Everything was ready. We shook hands with the others and were already going down the stair, when suddenly someone's voice hailed me from above.

I turned round. Leaning with folded arms on the balcony rails, not more than two feet above my head she stood—the dark-eyed, laughing girl.

For the first minute I scarce recognized her—so changed was her face. It was covered with a death-like pallor. Her eyes were opened wide and shone with a strange glitter, but the soft trembling lips were smiling as always. Quietly, without change of tone and without betraying emotion in her voice, she said:

"Take me with you! Take me!"

"But I—I'm going—Where to?" I stammered.

I was overwhelmed with surprise.

"Take me—from her. For ever!"

Suddenly she flung apart her folded arms and stretched them out in front of her.

"Old man! You're keeping us waiting!" my friend's voice cried gaily from below.

I ran down the stair and in a minute was seated in the carriage. The horses rounded the courtyard and set off down an avenue which ran exactly opposite the house. I lifted my head.

The young woman was still on the balcony. Her arms hung limply by her side. Once again for a moment her eyes rested their mysterious glance on me, and I felt a rebuke in it, in the closely-set, now pale lips.

I could see how someone who was also on the balcony went up to her and spoke to her; she answered with her continual loud laughter.

Around us everybody began to laugh loudly and noisily. And we too laughed as we glided on smoothly in the comfortable carriage along the soft, dusty road; but all the time a secret agitation, which I could not understand myself, did not leave me. I did not ask myself had I done well or ill. But the picture of the girl with outstretched arms lived in my imagination for many years afterwards.

A Fine Actor in a Poor Play

By Edward F. O'Day

If Israel Zangwill would drop his latest play into the melting pot it might be remolded into good dramatic form. In its present shape it will do at all. The nature of the theme makes a full explanation necessary. The idea that America is the melting pot of the world where a multitude of races is being fused into a nation with the best characteristics of its elements can only be conveyed by multiplying words and illustrations and in the mean time the dramatic action must be held in abeyance. In "The Melting Pot" the dramatic action begins in the third act and ends in the third act. Three-fourths of the play is devoted to the justification of the title and the other fourth is a little play in itself. Why did not Zangwill write an essay on "The Fusion of the Nations" and give us his dramatic action in a one-act play? The scene wherein the young Jewish refugee from Kishinef discovers that the girl he loves is the daughter of the Russian soldier who directed the massacre is, up to a certain point, a strong one and would surely be a thriller in vaudeville where its melodramatic nature would not be found so distasteful. But the thrilling scene is not sufficient for a play nowadays. Even in melodrama there is a demand for the logical development of the action from first to last, a development, of course, by equations and not by dialogue. A more experienced playwright might do a great deal with this Zangwill play, but he would probably hold fast only to the central idea and the central figure and work it out with quite different accessories. He would certainly discard the characters which walk in and out of the play for purposes of convenience without contributing anything to its denouement. That is why I say, into the melting pot with it! Naturally there is a great element in the population of every large city which will receive "The Melting Pot" with enthusiasm. I refer to our Jewish citizens. To them "The Melting Pot" makes a strong appeal; they would be less than human if it were otherwise. But its appeal is a matter of special pleading and special pleading does not make strong plays.

The best excuse that can be offered for the Zangwill play is that it affords us our first opportunity to enjoy the fine acting of Walker Whiteside. I am not familiar with this actor's career but the results of a careful training are omnipresent in his interpretation of the quixotic character of Quixano. There is quiet dignity, sincerity and gentle humor in his acting. He does as much for Zangwill as Zangwill has done for him. Perhaps more. Quixano, as Zangwill draws him, is not a character to lean heavily on our sympathies. Impetuous boys with high-flown notions of their careers are apt to be tiresome. In the case of Quixano I can imagine how tired we should be if a less accomplished actor than Walker Whiteside presented him to us. In all four acts he alienates the sympathy of the characters that surround him. In the first act he repulses the girl whom he is soon to love, in the second act he repulses the millionaire who wishes to assist in his musical education, in the third act he again repulses the girl and her father to boot and in the fourth act he repulses the public which has acclaimed his symphony. It is difficult for an actor to play a part like this in such a manner as to grip the goodwill of his audience but Whiteside does it without over-exerting himself. That is principally due to his gift of humor which plays about the character continually, softening the harshness that would otherwise be too frequently in evidence. No doubt we will not have to wait too long before seeing him in a part commensurate with his ability.

Ida Conquest May Marry

Chevalier Riccardo Bertelli, a distinguished looking Italian, who, incidentally, is in the importing business, has returned from Italy to New York and there are rumors that because of his devotion to Miss Ida Conquest, the actress will soon retire to play a leading role in private life. Miss Conquest's friends, who are aware of the Chevalier's devotion during the past three years, are awaiting an announcement.

Mildred—They were married in haste, I understand?

Eleanor—Yes. They had engaged a taxicab by the hour, so they requested the minister to hurry.

Miller Comes to the Columbia

Following an established custom Henry Miller, the actor-manager, is bringing to San Francisco his latest production while it is still in the bloom of success and interpreted by the original cast. His coming offering, "Her Husband's Wife," ran all last season in New York and Chicago alone and has not yet been offered in the other large cities of the East. After the engagement here it will go for the first time to Boston, Washington, Baltimore and other big cities. Additional interest attaches to Mr. Miller's engagement because he is making his first appearance for many years in a comedy role. His part is that of a California millionaire with a sense of humor. Laura Hope Crews, a San Francisco girl, is Mr. Miller's leading woman and the other important roles are in good hands. The engagement opens next Monday night, October 3.

ganizations that have been heard here. At today's (Saturday) matinee "La Boheme" which scored such a success on Thursday night will be given with the same cast. Tonight "Martha" will be sung for the last time. On this occasion Vicarino will appear as Lady Harriet and a feature of her performance will be her singing of "The Last Rose of Summer" in English. The others in the cast will be De Dreux, Sacchetti, Alberti and Florian. Tomorrow (Sunday) matinee "Trovatore" will be presented with Frery, Jarman, Giuliani, Campana, Secci Corsi and Florian. Tomorrow (Sunday) night "Lucia" will be the performance with Vicarino in the title role. Associated with her in the cast will be Sacchetti, Alberti, Bevani, Giuliani and Newcombe. The repertoire for next week is as follows: Monday and Friday nights "La Boheme" with Francini, Newcombe, Battain, Secci Corsi and Bevani; Tuesday night and Saturday matinee "Lucia" with Vicarino, Sacchetti, Alberti and Bevani; Wednesday night (last time) "Cavalleria" with Frery, Giuliani and Secci Corsi and "I Pagliacci" with Francini, Battain and Campana; Thursday night (in response to repeated requests) "La Traviata" with Vicarino, Sacchetti and Alberti.

"The Prince of Pilsen"

Walker Whiteside will give his final performances of "The Melting Pot" at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening and on Sunday evening "The Prince of Pilsen," the familiar musical comedy by Frank Pixley and Gustav Luders, will begin an engagement limited to eight nights and two matinees. Jess Dandy retains his humorous part of Hans Wagner, the Cincinnati Alderman. Frances Cameron is playing Mrs. Madison Crocker, the widow. Edward Mora has the part of Prince and Ivor Anderson that of the American naval officer.

"The Barrier" at the Alcazar

"The Barrier," adapted by Eugene W. Presbrey from Rex Beach's famous story of life in the Yukon country, is announced as the Alcazar's next offering, commencing Monday night. Although the play made an emphatic hit in New York and on the eastern and midwestern circuits last season it has never been presented in San Francisco. Competent critics have pronounced it a much better drama than its author's previous success, "The Spoilers," because its plot is equally interesting, but unraveled with finer skill. Elizabeth Stewart has been specially re-engaged to impersonate the heroine and with Thurston Hall, Louis Bennison, Howard Hickman, Burt Wesner, Thomas Chatterton, Charles Gunn, Walter Belasco and Adele Belgarde a capable cast is assured.

Scotti and De Pasquali Open Concert Season

Manager Will Greenbaum announces that he will open his concert season at the Columbia on Sunday afternoon, October 16, presenting Signor Antonio Scotti, the leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, in conjunction with Mme. Bernice de Pasquali, the brilliant young soprano who has succeeded to the Sembrich roles at the Metropolitan. Frederick Maurer Jr. will be the accompanist. Two Sunday afternoon concerts will be given at the Columbia on October 16 and 23 and a mid-week evening concert at the Novelty on Thursday October 20. Seats will be ready on Wednesday, October 12 and mail orders may now be sent to W. L. Greenbaum at Sherman, Clay & Co's and will receive prompt attention if accompanied by check or money order. Scotti and de Pasquali will appear in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse on Friday afternoon, October 21. The St. Francis Musical Art Society will hear these artists on Tuesday night, October 18, at the opening concert of the fourth season of the society's activities. A few memberships are yet to be secured and application should be made to the secretary, care of the Francis Hotel. The Colonial ball room where the concerts are given holds only four hundred and twenty-five, so naturally the list of members must be limited.

A Bill of Promise at the Orpheum

William Rock and Maude Fulton, considered by eastern critics the best and most inventive dancers on the American stage, will appear in their original dance creations at the Orpheum next week. Their performance is a revelation.

MAUDE FULTON

Who will appear with William Rock in their Original Dance Creations this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

Maurice Freeman, supported by Nadine Winst and a clever little company, will present John Hymer's one-act play "Tony and the Storl" Mr. Freeman impersonates an Italian who journeyed to New York to see his wife whom he had sent to a sanitarium. The sketch is one of the most original in vaudeville and gives Mr. Freeman a wide scope to display his splendid work and Ower, Europe's foremost eccentric gymnasts who proved such a popular feature at the Orpheum Road Show three years ago, have been brought to America again by Martin Be and will be included in next week's program. The Neapolitans, a trio of grand opera soloists consisting of Estelle Ward, Marion Littlefield and Signor Francesco Manetta, will be heard in popular classics and a potpourri of Neapolitan folk songs. Next week will be the last of the diverting "Baseballitis," Fred Singer, the viol

"Lena Rivers" at Ye Liberty

For next week Manager Bishop of Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, has arranged for a presentation of the dramatization of "Lena Rivers" that has been meeting with such pronounced success throughout the East. The novel by Mary J.
Holmes is an exceedingly popular one and as the play will be entirely new to western audiences the Oakland stock players are assured of a successful week. All Ye Liberty favorites will find congenial roles in "Lena Rivers" which offers opportunity for some attractive stage settings as well. "The Great John Ganton" is announced to follow and a production of "Going Some" is also in preparation for Ye Liberty audiences.

Idora Season near its Close

Only two more weeks remain before Idora
Park, the pretty pleasure resort in Oakland, closes its gates for the winter. The patrons of the "park beautiful" are attending the band concerts in bigger numbers than ever. During the coming week the band will give six evening concerts in the theater and two matinees, the other afternoon performances being held in the open air. From Monday until Saturday a special program will be presented each evening and on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons.

The Strauss-Kelley Concert

Lawrence Strauss, the tenor who made a deep impression last year by his excellent singing and intelligent interpretations of "lieder" and Miss Edith Gere Kelley, a young pianiste who has recently returned from abroad where she worked under such masters as Josef Lhevinne and Harold Bauer, announce a joint concert at Kohler and Chase Hall on Sunday afternoon, October 9.
Miss Therese Ehrmann will be the accompanist. Mr. Strauss will sing French, German and English songs. Miss Kelley will play a Beethoven Sonata and compositions by Chopin, Brahms and Schumann.

Famous Dancer Coming

The celebrated Countess de Swirsky whose dancing was one of the most sensational episodes of the past season in Newport will be seen in this city in November. None of the new school of interpretative dancers, not even Maude Allan, has excited more interest than this noblewoman.
Her work is distinctive and of the sort to stimulate criticism. Her appearance here is sure to be an event of unusual importance.

Hope Booth's Alarm

Guests at a hotel in New York were startled at about two o'clock one morning last week when a scantily attired young woman with a wealth of blond hair appeared in the corridor and loudly called for a doctor. The hotel clerk sent two boys to pacify her, with the explanation that the house physician had been called away on an emergency case. A prominent Wall Street banker, who lives at the hotel permanently, ventured into the corridor to learn the cause of the disturbance, and upon hearing the repeated calls for a doctor, volunteered to get his own physician. The lady —who was none other than Hope Booth, the actress—thanked him profusely. Mr. Banker dressed himself, called a taxicab, roused the physician, took him back to the hotel and to Miss Booth's apartment. There, instead of finding Miss Booth in the last stages of an awful malady, the doctor and the banker beheld the actress tenderly nursing her pet poodle, which had cramps. What the doctor and the banker said isn't recorded.

"What caused Kate to break her engagement?"
"She asked Jack to guess her age—and he did."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The security market has continued to run in an irregular course during the recent week with a narrow range of fluctuations in the leading stocks. Probably the best explanation of this is that the bankers are in complete control of a thoroughly liquidated stock market and desire to keep the market on an even keel until a number of important factors are cleared away. Crops are practically made for the year and little or no damage can occur now. The money situation however will not be satisfactory until the western requirements have been satisfied, which will probably be before October 15. In the interim, however, it is satisfactory to note a fair demand for bonds which is releasing much money to bankers' syndicates. This money will eventually go into the stock market. We question seriously if the political situation is a factor among the leading bankers today, as it seems a foregone conclusion that a Democratic sweep will go over the country and we believe that this is particularly desired in the banking and business interests generally. We look for a narrow and irregular stock market for some little time yet and then an upward swing of material proportions.

Wheat—An unusual period of indecision and inaction was seen in last week's grain market. Larger interests that have previously accepted profits on short wheat were apparently trying to let the market work higher so as to re-sell the wheat. Smaller traders were timid about opposing this interest in any way. The smaller professional speculators were fearful at all times that they would be overloaded on any substantial advance and were also afraid to take the short side in an aggressive way. The dullness, however, was creating a little more courage on the selling side as the week progressed without results favorable to buyers. It was a market in which professional interests did by far the greater part of the business. Popular sentiment was adverse to hammering prices below the $1 mark, in Chicago particularly, when that was relatively the lowest market in the country. On the other hand there was not much in sight to encourage buying for reasonably small profits.

Corn—Further declines in corn prices were made last week; the week passed without frost in the corn belt; more of the crop was brought to safety and rains during the week helped the fall feed to a capacity of the crop. The decline, however, has brought a very gratifying improvement in the export demand which will go far toward steadying the market and quite a liberal proportion of the old corn reserves have been put on wheels.

Cotton—Trade in cotton the past week has been mostly by the professional element and prices show very little change from last week. News has been mixed, but generally in favor of the bulls. The threatened lock-out at Manchester to begin October 1 was used by the bear crowd to force prices down early in the week but as there seemed to be quite a difference of opinion regarding the ultimate outcome in reference to price-making, it lost its effect. A shutdown at this time of the year looks like a prearranged affair by the millman to force prices for spot cotton to a lower level as the movement is quite heavy from the farm and, with the heavy curtailment by the American mills already in force, cotton will accumulate at the different ports and for the time being be a bearish card. Crop news is becoming sensationally bullish and from all sections of the belt come reports of deterioration. In some sections the boll worm and the boll weevil; in other sections drought is cutting down the crop. Some reports claim that the crop will be even smaller than last year. Receipts of cotton have been heavy and promise to be larger next week. Mills are not over-anxious for cotton and are trying to keep the market for the actual cotton in a weak position. The outsider is beginning to take notice of the sensational reports coming from the belt and is taking on the distant futures. In our opinion the damage already done to the growing plant warrants 15 cent cotton and, should an early frost overtake the crop which is said to be from two to three weeks late, there is no telling where the top would be.

Copper—Copper stocks have been very quiet but we look for activity to show before the next monthly statement on the metal visible supply, which will be published ten days hence. This report is expected to show the first effect of the general curtailment by a decrease of at least 15,000,000 pounds.

Afghan Justice

There were some interesting episodes in the life of Sir Charles Euan-Smith, who died in England recently. Once in the market-place of an Afghanistan town, he was fired at by a native. He lodged a complaint with the Ameer, who appeared to take no notice of the incident, merely remarking, "That's all right." Sir Charles complained again, and met with the same reply. He still thought that the Ameer was treating a serious matter with less consideration than it deserved, but thought it advisable to say no more on the subject. About a week afterwards he was invited by the Ameer to ride with him. They rode for some distance outside the town, and they passed gibbet after gibbet. At length Sir Charles said, "Your Highness has been busy of late." "Oh, no," replied the Ameer, "they are your little lot." He had seized all the members of the would-be assassin's family and hanged every one of them.

The Considerate Husband

Her husband was out walking with her for the first time since she had got her new hat satisfactorily trimmed. "Isn't it a perfect dream of a hat?" she remarked.

"I said," she repeated, after some moments of silence, "isn't this a dream of a hat?"

Still silence from the man. Then she ventured reproachfully:

"Why don't you say something?"

"My dear," he answered, "you seemed to enjoy your dream so that I was afraid of waking you."

The Physicians of the Murine Eye Remedy Company, Chicago, U. S. A., Oculists of years' standing, carefully prepare "The Murine Eye Remedies" in the Company's Laboratory. These Remedies are the result of their Clinical, Hospital and Private Practice, and they have found from their years of experience with Children's Eyes, that two drops of Murine in each Eye of the Growing Child is of inestimable value. Murine is an Eye Tonic and they know, if it is used regularly, that it Tones the Eye of the Growing Child and in many instances obviates the use of Glasses, and is it not reasonable that Glasses when not required will retard the development of a young and growing Eye?

Murine, through its Tonic effect, Stimulates Healthy Circulation and thus promotes the normal development of the Eye. We do not believe there is a Mother who has used Murine in her own Eyes and in the Eyes of the members of her family who would be without it, or who is not willing to speak of its Merits as The Household Friend.

The Child in the Schoolroom needs Murine. Murine contains no harmful or prohibited Drugs, and conforms to the Laws of the Country.

Druggists everywhere will supply Murine and tell you of its gratifying results.

Samples and Instructive Literature cheerfully sent by Mail to interested applicants. Murine Eye Remedy Co., Chicago, U. S. A.

he had heard that this was the way to get on with underlings. "Listen to me, my brave hero," he said. "While I was bathing in the Nile last evening someone stole my clothing. I swear to you that I am King Maurus!"

"Stuff and nonsense!" said the soldier. "The king is up there asleep."

Weak and weary, Maurus turned about to make his way, under shelter of the wall, to the villa of his beloved. There he would knock and beg some garments. Upon his lips fearful words trembled. He would destroy the entire city, annihilate it, just so soon—just so soon—just so soon as he had a mantle. A mantle? What? Then that's the way a king reigns, is it? A king is nothing but his clothes and insignia of rank. He caught sight of Dim. The old beggar was already up and waiting for a wine-shop to open.

"Give me your mantle," said the king humbly.

The beggar threw him a disdainful glance. "Ah-ha! we are not so high and mighty, I see! Where did you pawn your clothes for drink? Who plundered you like that? It's a shame for wine-dealers to pluck their customers. If I were the king I'd hang them all."

"That's just what I'll do," sighed Maurus. "Give me your mantle, and I'll do it."

"What, you will hang the rascals? Who are you?"

"I am the king."

Dim looked at him in amazement.

"Haven't you seen my face on the gold coins?"

"I never had any gold," said the beggar, giving the king the mantle.

Now he could hasten to the villa of Rogus! In spite of the early hour, a crowd of people were assembled by the gate as if in expectation. They were talking in whispers. The king recognized several of his faithful courtiers; they avoided him that his mantle might not soil their dainty attire. The king walked up, and striking the gate with his fist, called: "Open! I am the king! I command it!"

"Poor idiot!" laughed the watchman.

Maurus then turned in despair toward the lookers-on. "Do you not know me? My good subjects, look at me, I am your ruler."

A laugh was the answer.

"Kabul, I gave you an estate a few weeks ago—why are you silent? And you, Niles, whom I took from the gutter—will you deny me?"

But neither Kabul nor Niles recognized the king.

"Ingratitude, ingratitude!" he exclaimed. "Where is your mistress? Where is Florilla? She will recognize me."

Just as he said this a herald entered, upon whose uplifted spear was a woman's head. "Here is Florilla!" he cried.

It was indeed she, who would never recognize him again. She was silenced forever. The bright hair still rippled about the beautiful head and fell almost to the spear's end. The people yelled in triumph.

"Who dared do this thing!" the king exclaimed.

No one answered him. His curiosity was satisfied shortly. The herald nailed a death-warrant upon the gate that the people might read the royal signature and see the minister's seal, testifying that the deed had been done according to the requirements of the law.

Maurus, beside himself with fear sank to the ground, exclaiming: "Perhaps I am not King Maurus—not King Maurus at all!"

The crowd increased. Knights and ladies came once more to look upon the beautiful severed head, which would receive no more caresses nor again arouse love or envy. The beggar, too, came to enjoy the scene. Those upon whom the king had bestowed wealth and station did not trouble themselves about him. The beggar came up to him.

"Come away from here, good man," he said, "the lords will knock you down and trample upon you and tear up that mantle of mine," and he seized the king by the hand and led him away. He did not care what happened; he had no will of his own.

When he reached the great square his eyes lit up with courage, for he saw Narzis, the minister, standing at a corner of the street. He hastened to overtake and embrace him. "Narzis, Narzis, dear old fellow," he cried, "it's luck for me to find you."

The minister, in anger, made haste to free himself. "What folly is this?" he demanded.

"You do not recognize me? You, too, do not recognize me? Am I not really the king?"

"No, certainly not," replied the minister. "But you imitate his voice pretty well, if you were not so hoarse," and he struck him good-naturedly with the gold-headed cane the king had given him on his fiftieth birthday. In the merriest frame of mind the minister entered the palace.

With humble reverence the servants opened the doors as he passed from room to room on his way to the last salon, when, to his surprise, Rogus, clad in cloth of gold, stepped out to meet him. Rogus then proceeded to tell him all that had happened; how he had overheard the king's interview with Florilla, and how, in the king's clothes, he had entered the castle and placed Florilla's name upon the death-warrant.

The rest of the affair the chroniclers relate, but I will not repeat it, because I do not believe it myself.

The New Home of the Union Trust Company

The Union Trust Company of San Francisco opened for business last Monday in its new banking-house at Market street and Grant avenue, one of the finest in the country, and the place was crowded all day by patrons, friends of the bank officials and by strangers, attracted by the beauty of the building.

That the whole community takes an interest in the Union Trust Company may be inferred from the fact that the total assets under control of the company in all its departments exceed $150,000,000, which is more than any trust company in the country, outside of New York, controls. It pays taxes in every county in the State of California and in every State in the Union, on property belonging to estates of which the company is executor or trustee, and which range in value from $500 to $10,000,000.

The bank building, a graceful granite structure of the modern Grecian architecture, is an ornament to that part of the city, and is built to carry eight more floors if necessary. The main banking-room is fifty-five feet from the floor to the zenith of the glass dome, which diffuses a flood of light mellowed by the amber art glass through which the rays of the sun pass. The counters, panels and interior are of Carrara statuary marble, ornamented with bronze grill work.

The banking departments, savings and commercial, are installed on the main floor, and the trust department is located on the mezzanine floor, while the third floor contains the directors' room and the bookkeeping department. The vaults, bank and safe deposit are located in the basement, below the street level, safe from fire. These vaults are the largest in the country with the exception of the Carnegie safe deposit vaults in New York. The bank is equipped with telautograph, dictograph and all the latest devices tested and found desirable in the largest banks of the world, for communicating between departments, in writing or orally, and retaining a record of each word, spoken or written.

The color scheme produced by marble and metal fixtures, ivory and gold, was enhanced by the setting of numerous large and beautiful floral designs, made of California's choicest flowers, and sent in profusion by patrons and friends, hundreds of whom thronged the premises conveying hearty good wishes to Vice-President and Manager I. W. Hellman and his associates.

The bank with its millions in coin and valuables, was moved to its new quarters last Saturday afternoon, and was a record-breaker for moving a large institution in the shortest time known.

1911 CHALMERS MOTOR CARS

Refined But Practically Unchanged · 1909 and 1910 Good Enough

The Chalmers cars come from a factory producing quality and not quantity. THE CHALMERS PRINCIPLE is not to make as many cars as possible, but TO MAKE EACH INDIVIDUAL CAR AS GOOD AS POSSIBLE.

We regret that we were not able to furnish 1909 and 1910 models to all who wanted them, and while we fear that some were offended when told that they could not get the cars they wanted, we assure every one that it is much harder to tell a prospective buyer that he cannot have the car than it is to show him why he should have one.

It is possible that the Chalmers factory could build a sufficient number of cars to take care of every available customer, but in so doing they would, like a large number of other factories, sacrifice quality for quantity, and every car sold would not make a customer for another, as has been our experience during the past two years.

A few cars are still available for September delivery.

Auto Notes

More than usual interest has been taken in the announcements made by the Lozier Motor Company on account of the very prominent position taken by this firm within the past few years. The Lozier company put its first model on the market in 1905. It will be remembered as one which was far ahead of its time in design, the selection of materials and in workmanship. Close observers have noticed the steady advancement of the Lozier. The first few years the output increased slowly. There were two reasons for this, the first being that they sold for a much higher price than the best known cars. Secondly, the conservative management believed that the growth of a strictly high-class business would necessarily be slow. Since then the Lozier has gone rapidly ahead.

S. G. Chapman has just been advised that the Oakland "40" touring car was awarded the gold medal as the finest car exhibited at the Sacramento State Fair in the above-35-horse-power class. Great importance attaches to this award due to the fact that 70 cars, representing practically every make on the market, were on exhibition.

The preponderant use of Diamond tires is demonstrated by the number of cars that always wear this equipment in the various automobile shows throughout the country. A close account kept by the Diamond Rubber Company shows their tires to be away in the lead in this respect.

Mme. Blanca, the premier dancer of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York City, has for many years been an enthusiastic motorist and has owned cars of many makes. Her last purchase is a Haynes Model 19.

Of special interest to motorists whose tires are not large enough for the load is a list just published of eleven oversize Firestone tires. These tires are interchangeable with present tires on present rims but are built considerably heavier and contain from 30 per cent to 50 per cent greater cushion of air.

As the rainy season comes on one of the most important features of the auto supply stores becomes their winter clothing department. According to H. D. McCoy, secretary of the Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co., this phase of the motor supply business which started as an incidental has recently assumed very important proportions.

Over country that he declares much rougher than California affords W. T. Turner of Portland, Oregon, asserts that he has established a new mark for tire service. On July 7, 1907, Mr. Turner took delivery of a White Steam car equipped with Diamond tires. Since that time the Steamer has been kept in constant use, making innumerable long tours that covered the hardest going in Oregon and Washington, but the original tire equipment is still on the car and the total tire trouble registered in over three years is four punctures.

One of the best evidences of tire dependability was the service recorded for the recent Philadelphia-Atlantic City commercial vehicle reliability run. The Hartford Solid Motor Tires were easily the leaders in this contest both in point of number of cars equipped and general satisfaction given.

Theodore Kundtz, one of the biggest sewing machine cabinet manufacturers in the United States, after having used three White trucks at his Cleveland plant for several months has just placed an order for another one of these machines. In a letter that has been forwarded to C. A. Hawkins, Pacific Coast manager of the White Company, Kundtz declared that each one of these trucks displaces six horses.

C. W. Newhouse, assistant manager to S. G. Chapman, has just returned from an extended tour of the Northern sections of the State in the interest of Oakland, Hupmobile, Owen and Abbott-Detroit cars. Several new sub-agencies were placed and a number of old ones renewed.

Advices received by the Consolidated Motor Car Company state that the Pope Manufacturing Company have secured one of the choicest parking spaces on the Vanderbilt course right near the official grand stand and are sending invitations to all owners of a Pope-Hartford car, no matter what the model, to use the space for their cars.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco. Action No. 22691.

MRS. KATHERINE SINCLAIR and JOHN WILLIAM SINCLAIR, Plaintiffs, vs. All Persons Claiming Any Interest In, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The people of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Mrs. Katherine Sinclair and John William Sinclair, plaintiffs, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Greenwich street, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-two (122) feet, four (4) inches westerly from the westerly line of Scott street; running thence westerly and along the said southerly line of Greenwich street fifty-three (53) feet, seven (7) inches; thence at right angles southerly eighty-two (82) feet; thence at right angles easterly forty-three (43) feet, five (5) inches; thence northeasterly fifteen (15) feet, thence easterly seven (7) feet, eight (8) inches; and thence at right angles northerly sixty-eight (68) feet, nine (9) inches to the southerly line of Greenwich street and the point of commencement.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that plaintiffs are the owners of said property in fee simple absolute; that their title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiffs recover their costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

Witness my hand and seal of said Court this 29th day of August, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk. (Seal)

By M. GRAGEN, Deputy Clerk.
